PREFACE.

ENCOURAGED by the kind reception given to my Indian Journal, I have ventured to prepare this earlier one for publication; though I am well aware that the subject is less new, and that Canada, and the life a Governor-General leads there, are much better known, and offer less novelty to most readers, than did a similar record of the Viceroy's social life in India.

Both Journals were sent in the same way, as weekly letters to my mother, and the only difference between the two is this—that whereas the one was published directly I returned from India, the first pages of my Canadian diary were written nearly twenty years ago, and it is more than twelve since the book was closed.

In a prosperous and quick-growing country like Canada, every year makes a difference, and I know, both from hearsay and from pictures I have seen, that places I mention as villages have become towns; that a new railway traverses the Northwest, with cities springing up everywhere in its wake; that Ottawa itself has quite outgrown my memories of it; that the contemplated improvements, designed to keep Quebec the most beautiful city in the world, have been accomplished; and that in almost every part of the Dominion the hand of progress has been busy, building, adding to, and improving.

My little Journal, therefore, is rather a record of the past than a description of the present; and this I sadly feel, as I find in it the names of many who have passed away, some leaving never-to-be-filled blanks in their own homes, others mourned by a whole nation.

Nothing has oppressed me more in the revision of this Journal than the sense that, from the necessity of shortening it as much as possible, I have done scant justice to the kindness of many friends, and that some of those of whom we saw the most, and who added so materially to the happiness of our daily life in Canada, are scarcely mentioned in it. The Prime Ministers, for instance, who, with their wives, were constantly associated with all we did, are only occasionally mentioned, though the warm affection we felt for Sir John and Lady Macdonald, and for Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie, are among the pleasantest recollections of our Canadian life.

And the same may be said of their colleagues, and of many others, who, if they read these pages, will, I hope, remember that they relate but a quarter of the events and the pleasures of the years we spent in Canada, and give but a few of the names of those with whom we made enduring friendships, and with whom we worked and played and enjoyed our life in the Dominion.

I have also been sorry to pass so very lightly over the cordiality and the friendliness invariably shown us whenever we crossed our borders into the United States; for whether we were traveling officially through Chicago or Detroit, or went as ordinary visitors to New York or Boston, we were always received with a kindness and a hospitality which we can never forget.

I must also say one word as to the silence on all political matters maintained in this Journal. I have not attempted to record in it any part of the business of the Governor-General; and it is only as they affected our movements, or our social arrangements, that I have, even distantly, alluded to public events, and then, I fear, in a somewhat light and irresponsible spirit.

The Governor-General and his wife belong to no party; and we met with such universal kindness from all persons with whom we came in contact in the Dominion, that I, at least, never wanted to remember that people differed from each other in their political views, and was only too glad to leave politics to those whom they necessarily concerned.

CHAPTER I.

ARRIVAL IN CANADA.

S. S. "Prussian": Friday, June 14, 1872.—Ugh! horrid! Very rough; everybody ill except the wretched baby, Basil, who is perfectly well, but can get no one to dress him, and is handed about, unwashed, to engineers, waiters, to any one who can stand.

Monday, 17th.—The ship rolling from side to side till one's back aches. Such a noise of splashing and dashing and falling about, and such fears lest my infants should follow the example of my toothbrush, and come flying across the room! To add to my fears, two steerage passengers came to D. in the night, to inquire whether he thought there was any danger, and if the captain might not be asked to put into port until it became calmer. In the morning these men were found sleeping with life-belts on.

Wednesday, 19th.—We are much better now, and quite enjoy our meals, which D. and I have in a cabin by ourselves.

We are also able to look about, and find that there are 107 "street Arabs" on board, brought out by a saint of a woman, who, although very sick and miserable herself, sings to them, reads out loud, goes down into the steerage, sees them to bed, and performs many other trying offices in the most unselfish manner. Miss Macpherson pays her own passage and expenses. Each child costs £10 to bring out, and will eventually be adopted into a Canadian family, where it will have a happy home. This seems to be an excellent charity.

Sunday, 23d.—A beautiful day—a hot sun and a perfectly calm sea. Our parasols and shady hats have come out for the first time, and Hermie and Basil* are being made very much of by the convalescent passengers. Preparations are making for our arrival at Quebec; and, as it has been discovered that there is no Canadian flag on board, my maid, Mrs. Dent, is busily engaged in trying to manufacture one. Nobody is quite sure what it is, but all suppose that there must be a beaver and a maple-leaf in it. I sincerely hope that no great herald will be waiting to receive us.

We have attended a meeting in the steerage, where some of the Canadian passengers talked to the emigrants about the country they are going to. D. also spoke, and told them that in Canada they need never complain, as he had heard one of them do, "that he had too many children," for that there the more they had the better. An enthusiastic young man on hearing this slapped D. on the back and said, "That is just what I have been telling Emily."

Quebec : Tuesday, 25th.—A lovely morning. We anchored early, but did not land till ten, when the Ministers, Lieutenant-Governor, and several other officials, came on board, and with them we went ashore. A salute was fired from the citadel as D. stepped on land, and we walked through lines of troops to a carriage-and-four, in which we drove to Spencer Wood, the Lieutenant-Governor's residence. We passed through Quebec, up a very steep hill. The road was rough, and it was extremely hot and dusty. I could not see the view as we were driving away from the river, and also, I was much occupied in looking at the people who filled the streets; but when we got to Spencer Wood we were charmed with it, and it looks right down upon the St. Lawrence. At three o'clock D. was sworn in as Governor-General of Canada, and received some addresses of welcome,—but, as I remained quiet in my country retreat, I can tell you nothing of the ceremony. Our host is Sir Narcisse Belleau; his wife is a nice quiet little Frenchwoman, and he is pleasant and kind. There was a dinner in the evening,—but I don't feel that I have seen enough of any of the guests to tell you about them to-day, except that the Prime Minister, Sir John Macdonald, is the image of Dizzy.

Wednesday, 26th.—The papers give a most amusing description of D., stating his apparent weight and height. I am very flatteringly described, though the ignorant male writer speaks slightly of my dress as being a “plain blue silk,” whereas it was in reality excessively smart, and had caused me infinite trouble and anxiety! However, I had the satisfaction of hearing from Lady Harriet Fletcher* that the ladies knew better, and had appreciated it.

Lady Harriet and I had a drive about the old town, and I was quite delighted with it. The views are perfectly lovely, and it would be such a charming place to live in,—if only we had a house here!

* Daughter of the Earl of Romney, wife of Lord Dufferin's Military Secretary.

In the afternoon we started for Ottawa in a magnificent river-steamer with four stories and streets of cabins, and a grand table a'hôte on board. We sat on deck and enjoyed ourselves immensely as we went up the St. Lawrence. I can not tell you what a lovely voyage this was!—so lovely that I can not believe that we did it of necessity, and not for pleasure only.

Thursday, 27th.—We arrived at Ottawa, the first view of which is magnificent; but once landed there was no time to look at anything! There were nine addresses to be listened to, and after them we drove off to our new home! . . . We have been so very enthusiastic about everything hitherto that the first sight of Rideau Hall did lower our spirits just a little! The road to it is rough and ugly, the house appears to me to be at the land's end, and there is no view whatever from it, though it is near the river—and we have come through hundreds of miles of splendid scenery to get to it! Then I have never lived in a Government House before, and the inevitable bare tables and ornamentless rooms have a depressing effect: for the first time I realize that I have left my own home for many years,—and this is its substitute!

Friday, 28th.—Please forget the above growl. The morning has brought more cheerful reflections. We are not intended to live here at midsummer, and I dare say that in winter this place looks lovely! Our house is, they say, very warm and comfortable, and the Houses of Parliament—which, after all, I do see from my windows—are very beautiful. And I can cover up the tables and supply the homey look which at present is wanting—so why did I grumble? We have driven in state through the town, and have visited the Government buildings. I was delighted with the Senate, and with the Library—a large, circular room. When the House is sitting I may come and listen to debates, but the Governor-General may not!

The weather is extremely hot, and we are not going to remain here. D. goes to-morrow to inspect militia at Prescott, and I meet him there two days later.

Monday, July 1st.—We went for a row on the river in the evening, which was delicious. It was very pretty; and we had a breath of fresh air, and got out of a perspiration for the first time for a week!

We have been busy making a number of household arrangements. I have chosen my nurseries; and it has been decided to add a story to the little house in the garden in which the Fletchers will live,—for they have a number of children too. The non-arrival of all our heavy luggage has been an anxiety; so far our viceregal establishment possesses about six plates and as many cracked teacups; and our own supply of china, plate, and linen seems to be trying to see the country, and to travel for pleasure, instead of coming and settling down here as it should.

Perhaps you may wonder where my children are all this time. The three elder ones are still in Europe, trying to learn a little French, and Hermione and Basil, who came out with us, are now at Rivière du Loup, where we have taken a house for the summer. There, also, are the Fletcher children. Colonel* and Lady Harriet Fletcher came out to Canada the mail before we did, and made all arrangements for us and for themselves. He is the Military Secretary. We have two very nice A. D. C.s at present. One of them was with Lord Lisgar, and has kindly volunteered to stay and help us for a time. The other is Mr. Coulson, who is regularly appointed, and who will remain even after

* The late Colonel Fletcher, C. M. G., Scots Fusilier Guards.

Fred comes out. Please tell the latter that I find that an A. D. C. is a charming institution. These two ask me "if I will drive," "or walk," "or boat," or "if I want anything from the town"; and if I turn my head, they find out what I am looking for, and get it for me. So Fred need not hope to get off any of his duties through my ignorance of them!

D. is very happy, and is much taken with the country and the people; and all here seem pleased with him. I think that I am getting on pretty well too,—though I say it that should be silent in the matter; and the papers, who talk about us a good deal, lay great stress on my not being affected—a negative virtue which I may mention without appearing too conceited!

- My attentive A. D. C.s have taken me to see the Chaudière Fall. It is close to Ottawa, and is very beautiful. There is a mass of water which appears to fall in three different directions into the same pool, and a great smoke of foam rises from the splash; it looks just like a big caldron. Close to it is a saw-mill. The trunks of forest-trees are carried by the stream to the door of the mill, where they are caught by chains and slowly dragged into the teeth of a bundle of saws. After passing through these, the trees fall in planks, which are quickly taken up by another machine to have their sides neatly trimmed. As they pass, a man marks them with a pencil according to their quality.

After this we "ran the slide," which was very exciting. The "slide" is a long incline of water, divided into a series of small waterfalls, and is the artificial road by which the timber from the higher levels is brought down into the St. Lawrence. The wood is made up into rafts, and you sit upon these while they slip down the incline. It looks rather alarming to see one of these great monsters go headlong into the water at the foot of each fall ; but, although I got on board with my heart in my mouth, I liked it extremely, and when I found myself safe on the calm level of the Ottawa, I would gladly have recommenced the journey had it been possible : but when one has slid down this steep hill of water to the river, one is miles away from the starting-point, and has to go home another way. The rafts and the quantities of wood lying about in all directions are the most curious sights here, but I see no really fine timber growing in this neighborhood.

Wednesday, 3d.—I left Ottawa early, and met D. at Prescott. He had been inspecting volunteer camps at Kingston and Prescott, and is to see another at Laprairie to-morrow.

We shot the rapids. The rapids are places where there is a tremendous stream rushing over a rocky descent. When the steamer comes to them the engine is stopped, and the current carries the vessel over the broken water at a great rate. If the pilot were to make a mistake, or to lose command of the ship, she would be wrecked. The rapids look like a stormy sea, but you do not go up and down in them, and rather feel as though the vessel were being buffeted about, and as if it were striking some hard substance. The worst rapid is called the "Lachine," and that does look rather alarming. The rapids are all down hill, and going at such a great pace the pilot* appears to be steering straight upon some fearful rock, peeping above water, when just as you expect the crash, the stream takes the vessel and carries her clear of the danger.

We were met at Montreal by the Mayor and a guard of honor.

* The pilot on this occasion was "Old Baptiste," who took us down a channel he had himself first found in 1842.

Quebec : Friday, 5th.—I saw a little of Montreal yesterday, but not enough to warrant a description. We went to a little country place, where we had strawberries and cream under the trees, and when I returned to the hotel I received visitors. I find Canadian society very easy to get on with: the people talk, and they are very simple and natural, and willing to be pleased; so that receiving seventy or eighty total strangers is made a pleasant instead of an arduous task,—as it might be.

D. was occupied all day inspecting a camp, and in receiving addresses.

We dined early, and went on board the steamer for Quebec. There were 800 passengers, most of them lying about on the floors; but we had comfortable cabins, and slept well all night. The only new things we saw on this journey were the fire-flies; they were so numerous on the wooded banks of the river that their lights looked like those of a distant town.

Saturday, 6th.—The Governor-General has some of the privileges of the old kings of France, and one of them is that he has the right to enter the cloistered convents. In his train, therefore, we have been to the Ursulines and to the Hôtel-Dieu. The Vicar-General went with us, and at each convent, after inspecting the ordinary arrangements of the house, we went into a room where the nuns were arranged in rows, and where we sat on thrones on a daïs. In a clever, easy way the Vicar inaugurated a kind of general conversation about the convent, and the nuns laughed at his little jokes, and answered any questions put to them. We were greatly struck by their manners, so pleasant and cheerful, without the slightest affectation or shyness.

Monday, 8th.—We made an expedition to the Montmorency Falls. D. went in the Dauntless, a thirty-six-ton yacht which he has bought, and we rowed in a big boat. The fall is six miles from Quebec. The day was very fine, and as we saw them from the river the shining tin roofs of the town looked beautiful in the sunshine.

The first view of the fall is spoiled by the quantity of timber at its base. The bay is crammed with stacks of boards and wood, piled up in every way, and there are saw-mills hard at work; but when you get close enough to see it, the Montmorency is really beautiful. It is 170 feet high—higher than Niagara—and it falls perfectly straight down into the earth, clouds of spray rising up in front of it. The water does not appear to rush on as in most waterfalls, and it is supposed that it dives into the ground, and comes out elsewhere.

We had brought provisions with us, so we lighted a fire, cooked an excellent lunch, and afterward made tea. In the cool of the evening we rowed back to Quebec, and got on board the steamer for Rivière du Loup. This is the fashionable time for going to the seaside, so the boats are very full.

Rivière du Loup: Tuesday, 9th.—Our house here is a nice little cottage, but it is a long way from the sea, and I don't think that we shall care to shut ourselves up in it for long. We are impatient to see more of the country and the people, and if only we can find a house at Quebec we shall go there; for the more we see of that place, the more we like it.

Wednesday, 10th.—After getting my letters ready for the mail we set out for the yacht. The day was not very good, but there was a nice breeze, and although the Fletchers and I felt a little uncomfortable at first, we all got over it and enjoyed ourselves very much. H. E. was delighted with the Dauntless. His sailors are not very smart, but he is looking forward to the arrival of Hammond,* who will soon give it the air of an English yacht. The Dauntless has a well to sit in, and a large but rather low cabin. She is one of the flat yachts with a sliding keel. D. steered back into the harbor before an admiring crowd just arrived by the steamer. An American on the shore called out, "Well, Governor, you seem to be used to this kind of work."

Thursday, 11th.—Dr. Campbell, of Montreal, came here to offer D. some salmon-fishing. He has accepted for two days, and goes next Wednesday, the 17th—Colonel Fletcher with him. They will live in a camp, and be eaten by black flies and mosquitoes. The former have a sharp lance, which they insert under the skin. You do not feel the bite at the time, but it bleeds freely and inflames next day. While fishing, you keep your face and neck covered with a preparation which the flies dislike. Dr. Campbell gave an exciting account of the fishing, and how the fisherman runs along the banks as fast as he can, while the salmon rushes down the rapids. I think I should like to go too—but ladies are not invited.

Saturday, 20th.—H. E. returned in the evening. He enjoyed his trip very much, though the salmon were scarce, and he only caught five trout. Dr. Campbell, Mr. Urquhart, Colonel Fletcher, and himself, were the party. Mr. Urquhart attended to the dinner, and was "most anxious" about it,—it consisted of salmon and cold beef, and was very good; still, it does not sound as if it required immense thought and preparation.

Monday, 22d.—Colonel Fletcher has gone off to see houses at Quebec.

In the afternoon we drove to Cacouna, a more fashionable watering-place than this, where there is a large hotel frequented by Americans, who amuse themselves by dressing four times a day.

Wednesday, 24th.—D. and I started in the afternoon for Tadousac. It was quite dark when we got there, after two hours in the steamer, and we could only see that we drove up a most dangerous road. It was a wooden ramp, just wide enough for the carriage, and with a little precipice on each side. It led to the hotel, which we found extremely clean and comfortable. I think they manage these things very well in Canada. There is a complete absence of pretense. The furniture is very plain: just a strip of carpet in one's bedroom, common-looking French beds, washing-stand and chest of drawers—no curtains anywhere—the only luxury being extreme cleanliness. There is a table d'hôte where all dine—servants at the same table as the other guests—and the food is very good. We had private rooms and private meals, but no one else would think of such a thing. The same simplicity strikes me as characteristic of the people. They do not pretend to be fine or smart, or anything but what they are; they believe every word you say, and take all polite exaggerations au pied de la lettre. They are exceedingly friendly and kind-hearted, so that their saying what they think does not lead to any uncomfortable speeches.

Tadousac is the oldest, but I should think the smallest, place in the Dominion. Not only as tourists, but as sailors, we are delighted with it. The hotel is situated in the curve of a lovely bay, with a nice sandy beach all round it. There are rocky walks of a most amusing description for the walker, a good anchorage for the yachtsman, and as all the fishing is up the Saguenay, and this place is at its mouth, there is sport for the sportsman. There are white porpoises and seals, and occasional whales to be seen rolling and jumping about—and altogether we thought the place most attractive, and have some idea of building a house here for the summer.

Thursday, 25th.—We got up at six to go out fishing, and drove down to the pier, where we found Mr. Radford, a resident here, who had promised to chaperon us to the fishing-ground. It was rather too stormy, but we started nevertheless in the yacht, followed by two row-boats. We had a charming sail, a beautiful coast to look at, and white porpoises and seals appearing in the water to amuse us. When we reached the Bergeron we anchored, and went on shore to prepare our fishing-rods. I was just being instructed in the art of throwing the fly, and was standing up in the row-boat, lashing the water with my line, when H. E. called out from the other boat, "Put up your rod, and come and save the ship." The yacht had dragged her anchor, and was fast going on the rocks. We got on board as quickly as we could, fastened tow-ropes to the two row-boats, and with great difficulty got her out of the current; her sails filled, and off we went. "Home," said His Excellency—and in fact it had come on to blow too hard for fishing, as the trout go into deep water when the waves are too much for them. We had a very rough sail back to Tadousac, but rather enjoyed it. We reached the hotel in time for lunch, and settled with our friend to get up at five next day and try again.

In the afternoon we took a walk, and were quite charmed with Tadousac. It is at the mouth of the Saguenay River, and the hotel is built close to the water, above a beautiful bay. Our walk was a climb, and yet it was not too fatiguing; the rocks are smooth, with no sharp points, and tufts and shrubs grow in the interstices, so that there is always something to catch hold of if you slip. When we got home, Mr. Radford brought two Rice Lake canoes, and D. tried paddling in one, while I went out in the other.

Friday, 26th.—Called at 5 A. M., with the information that the day was very favorable for fishing. We were at the wharf at six—a beautiful morning. There were two row-boats ready for us, and we set off, up the Saguenay.

The river is like a rift in a rocky mountain, and it was very pretty in the early morning rowing along it; great cliffs on each side, the river every now and then spreading out into a bay, and looking like a lake, the entrance quite hidden by projecting rocks. We had a three-hours' row, and arrived at St. Etienne, a feeding-ground of the trout. I again began to throw my fly, and soon became quite expert at it. I caught sixteen, and D. nineteen, and after my arm ached Mr. Radford took my rod and caught four; so our bag was a pretty good one.

We lunched on the rocks, and afterward got on board and sailed nearly the whole way home till it began to rain, then the wind fell, so we took to our row-boats and got back in time for dinner. Our long day was not over yet. The young ladies of Tadousac had got up a charity concert, which we attended: it was in the hotel, and between the songs there were some pretty tableaux. When all was over I was glad to return to my dear bed which I had left so early in the morning.

Saturday, 27th.—Another lovely day. We like Tadousac so much that we have actually chosen a site, and are going to build a wooden house here for next year. The air is delicious, and we feel so well and cheerful!

After breakfast we walked to an Indian hut to see a young bear they had found on the hills. He was very little and very unamiable-looking. The Indian women are very dark and ugly, and have their hair tied up in little bags on each side of their faces. D. next took me out in a canoe, and we had a talk with the authorities about our site. At two we got on board the steamer, and returned to Rivière du Loup.

Colonel and Lady Harriet Fletcher came down to meet us, and we hear from him that the artillery quarters at Quebec are more likely to suit us than any other house we can get this year. D. will go and see them.

Monday, 29th.—Directly after breakfast Lady H. and her governess and children came in to help me to prepare for my first Canadian entertainment! Unfortunately, D. will not be at it, as he has gone off to Quebec. Of course we have small means here of doing anything grand—no ornaments at all; thick, white earthenware cups, lodging-house furniture, etc., and only wild flowers to be had. With them we determined to do a great deal. We got moss and ferns, wild roses and red berries; called in soup-plates, finger-glasses, and bark canoes; and had in the drawing-room fourteen bouquets—eight on brackets round the walls, and one on each table. Then we put moss on the chimney-piece and filled it with bright flowers, and covered the board in front of the fireplace with fir-branches, etc. Opposite the drawing-room is the best bedroom. We carried out the bed, arranged the fireplace in the same way, and had tables with tea, coffee, iced milk, champagne cup and cakes there. On one side of our house we had croquet, and on the other chairs, and I received my company at four o'clock in the chair department.

The arrangements took us the whole morning, and amused us very much; the only drawback was that we had no man, not even an aide-de-camp!

Luckily, the day was splendid. We sat ourselves upon the lawn, and soon the first people came. The second carriage which arrived contained three priests with French names! They had no cards, and Nowell, our English servant, whom I had told to be very particular about announcing the names clearly, remembering my instructions, and unable to pronounce them, stopped my guests outside and made them write their names on a piece of paper. One of them, a very jolly Irishman, asked, "Are you His Excellency's aide-de-camp?"

When all had arrived a good game of croquet was got up, and the people who did not play sat on the lawn and talked. I had over thirty, and they admired our decorations very much.

The moment my party broke up, and in sight of many of the visitors, my neighbors' servants came to fetch the things they had lent me; and it was funny to see cups and soup-plates and chairs being carried off to their lawful owners. I had asked people from four to six, and, like Cinderella, they rushed off when the hour struck.

Wednesday, 31st.—We arrived at Tadousac late last night, bringing the children with us. I took them this morning to a sandy place, where they soon improvised spades and began to "make a dirt," as Hermie said.

In the afternoon Lady H. and I went a drive—the only drive here. It begins on a very sandy road, comes to a place where the horses have, every few minutes, to walk down one wall and up another, continues through the remains of a burned forest, where the charred stumps of trees are almost buried in the luxuriant, fresh green vegetation springing up around them, and then brings you to a place which is really fearful: one side of the road is a steep precipice, the other a loose sandy hill, which is constantly slipping down and filling up the very narrow space you have to drive on. Here we got a pretty peep of the Saguenay, while heretofore we had been looking upon the St. Lawrence. D. and the Colonel went out boating.

Sunday, August 4th.—The day was foggy and rainy, but we walked to the little church, which D. admires, and where, he says, we see “the first principles of architecture.” It is the first church ever built in Canada, and is made of wood, just as you would make one with a child’s box of bricks; the walls are long and short bars of wood, piled one upon the other. It is very quaint and simple. The service at Tadousac depends upon stray clergymen, and this Sunday there was none staying in the place, so they asked an American Scripture-reader to read prayers, and he gave us a very nice service. D. and I took a walk in the afternoon, and were inveigled into paying a visit. We are too grand to pay visits as a rule, but sometimes we meet a friend at his own door, and he asks us to come in.

Monday, 5th.—We were suddenly struck with the idea of going salmon-fishing; so we ordered a hamper of provisions to be ready in twenty minutes, took a comb and brush and a pocket-handkerchief in a bag, and set off, D. and I in the Imogene, which is a small yawl, Hammond following in the Dauntless. We had a lovely sail up the Saguenay to the mouth of the Marguerite River, where we arrived about four o’clock, and sent ashore for the fisherman. Then we each got into a canoe, and began to ascend the rapids! I have already described the rapids as they appeared from a steamer, but from a canoe one sees the dangers more closely. A man stands at each end of the canoe, with a long pole in his hand; the passenger sits in the middle, on the floor. The current is something tremendous, and the water dashes about the rocks in quite a fearful way. The men pole the boat along, first giving a shove on one side and then on the other, shaving rocks, and conducting her safely with wonderful skill. It is very hard work, and when I said sympathetically to our conductor that it must be fatiguing work, he replied with very great fervor, "Joliment fatiguant." This is going up the rapids; coming down the rush is with you, and then with equal skill the men use their paddles and ward the boat off from the rocks, stopping her in her headlong career as she appears to be rushing to destruction. We went up successfully, and landed about eight o'clock at the edge of a wood, groped our way up a narrow path, and found ourselves at three small wooden huts. The first was a dining-room and pantry, the second two bedrooms, the third a place for the men. Opposite the dining-room, but fifty yards from it, was an open shed, which I found to be the kitchen; and as I sat at the head of the table I saw Imps dancing about the fire cooking our dinner.

Opposite our encampment there is a curious geological—or clayological—formation: it looks as if half a high hill had been cut clean away with a knife—in fact, a perfect section of a hill is exposed to view. It is quite as flat as the side of a cheese, with nothing growing upon it, but the top is crowned with trees. The side is gray clay, and it is six hundred feet high.

We were very glad to retire soon to our little iron beds, and to creep under our mosquito-curtains; but I confess I felt a certain emotion at the idea of sleeping in such a lonely place, with no one between us and the North Pole!

Tuesday, 6th.—Notwithstanding the solitary feelings which oppressed me for a time last night, I slept, and was ready to get up at five. We performed a hasty "toilet," swallowed a cup of tea, and took the canoes for fishing. We were both most industrious, and flogged the water with our flies, but had no bites; then "Peter," the fisherman, took my rod and hooked a salmon. My rod is small, and he exclaimed, as the salmon ran off with the line, that "the cord was too short." Quick as possible he jumped into a canoe, and we saw a most exciting chase; the salmon flying off with yards of line,—being wound up again,—giving an occasional jump into the air, and battling courageously for life. When he was getting worn out Peter landed and insisted upon my holding the rod. I found it almost too heavy for me, and I had a great deal of help in finishing the poor victim, who still made dashes to release himself. At last we got him near the shore, when a cruel gaff was stuck into him, and a cry of triumph from the men announced his death to us, and to the listening woods. The salmon weighed fifteen pounds.

At nine we went home to our breakfast. After it we sat at the kitchen fire and burnt holes in the only boots we had with us! The day was very fine, and we walked and sat about till four o'clock, when fishing recommenced. I must tell you that we were oiled all over, face and neck and hands, with a strong-smelling stuff, to keep off the mosquitoes.

Again D. and I began to work, and soon he hooked a salmon, and I laid down my rod to see the fight. It lasted a long time, and the fish led the fisherman a good dance before he died. He weighed fourteen and a quarter pounds, and was His Lordship's first salmon! We caught no more.

Wednesday, 7th.—At eight o'clock we left the huts and went down the rapids, the men singing some of their wild and curious boat-songs as they paddled us along. We had arranged to fish for trout at the place where we had anchored the yachts, and then to be picked up by the steamer on its way down the Saguenay, and to go on to Rivière du Loup. However, to our astonishment, we saw our steamer going up the river. She had been detained by fog, and our plans were thus put out. There was nothing for it but to sail back to Tadousac, and await the steamer's return there. We had a couple of very disagreeable hours, and finally arrived at our destination in a fog, a thunderstorm, and a heavy shower. As we expected the steamer's immediate return, we merely lay down upon our beds, and waited till five o'clock in the morning, when at last she arrived, and D. and I and our two sleepy children got on board. D. went straight on to Quebec, so he retired to bed; but as we were to reach Rivière du Loup in two hours, we remained up, and got there at last very hungry and tired.

CHAPTER II.

QUEBEC.

The Citadel : Friday, August 9th.—Lady Harriet and I have joined D. at Quebec, and I am much pleased with my barrack home. All books about Canada will tell you how splendid is the situation of the Citadel; very high, and commanding a magnificent view of that great river the St. Lawrence. Our house—"quarters," I should say—is not yet quite ready, and workmen are still busy papering and making alterations. The old mess-room is our dining-room, and the drawing-room is above it. It is a long room, with windows at either end: those facing the river open on to an immense platform, the outer wall of which forms a balustrade. There I sit and look down hundreds of feet upon the town lying below me; or into the ships, on to whose decks I fancy I could almost throw a stone; or at the St. Lawrence itself, and at the blue hills far away—in fact, at one of the most celebrated views of the world! There are great black cannon also looking out from the Citadel, and the Union Jack and the Dominion Flag are flying beside me. I assure you it is very romantic!

I am rather afraid that with your little English ideas you will not understand the size of my "platform," but it is big enough to give a ball on, or a garden party, or a charity bazaar, or any other sort of gathering you like! —so open your mind for the consideration of it.

D. and Colonel Fletcher rode, and I went for a charming drive, and was more pleased than ever with the country round Quebec. Everything is growing so luxuriantly now. The hedges are full of flowers and large wild maidenhair fern, and quantities of berries which all seem to be eatable; and the crops, which, before they were fully developed, looked miserable, have suddenly swelled out and filled up all the bare places one deplored a month ago.

Monday, 12th.—The weather is very hot, but not oppressive. People here live behind green blinds, and shut the sun out of their houses: they can not understand our liking to see it shine in, and they complain of the heat much more than we do.

Tuesday, 13th.—In the afternoon we went out to do some shopping. The most important part of it was choosing furniture for a little room. It was difficult to get what we wanted. They have no plain stuffed sofas or chairs—everything is surrounded by elaborate carvings in wood, and the men are astonished that their Excellencies “n’aiment pas la sculpture.”

We are miserable over our heavy luggage, which will not arrive. We have nine dessert-plates, and no other china, no silver plate at all, no harness, and it is impossible to “set up” or to give dinners until these things arrive. No one traveling here should lose sight of his box for an instant. Things are never lost, but they may be months getting to their owner.

I have been looking for a scullery-maid, and find women-servants very scarce. I have only seen one young lady in search of the place: she spoke with a real Irish brogue, and appeared in a smart hat and feathers. She was extremely surprised at my wishing to have a character. She had one, but had left it at home, not supposing I should care to see it; of course she could fetch it directly. Next morning she brought me three lines, on very common paper, which, in very bad writing, certified her to be honest and "oblidgeing." In spite of the brogue she was Canadian, and was "sure she didn't know what Mama was," when I questioned her as to her nationality.

Friday, 16th.—Having got my eleven letters shut up all ready for the mail, I took a complete holiday from writing, for one is always pen in hand here, and letter-writing becomes one's normal condition. We look upon our epistles as seed sown, and are always egging each other on to write to new people, that our harvest of news may be plentiful.

The weather has changed, and a gale is blowing. We hardly know our Quebec in this tempest, and long to see it in its usual sunshine again.

Every afternoon we take a drive, and generally manage a little walk too. Colonel Strange* has lent us some arms, and at the top of our crimson-clothed staircase we have a magnificent arrangement of swords and spears and flags; opposite it a star of bayonets. Our drawing-room is not yet finished, but we hope it will be ready by Monday, when we have a dinner of twenty-four people; "and yet I am not happy," for glass, plate, and china are still on their travels. Eleven of our twenty-four are cricketers, who are expected to arrive to-morrow from England.

Mr. Pattisson, D.'s Private Secretary, arrived from Ottawa.

Monday, 19th.—We were busy the whole morning arranging the drawing-room; then we drove to the town to get table-covers and some finishing touches. Our efforts were crowned with success, and the room looked extremely pretty.

* In command of B Battery, Canadian Artillery.

Nearly everything had to be hired for the dining-room; but about an hour before dinner a few cases arrived, and two or three salvers were got out to ornament the sideboard.

We had thirty people—eleven of them cricketers. The dinner was supposed to be at 7.30, and the Canadians arrived punctually, but the English guests were somewhat London-like in their hours. In the evening the officers of the B Battery, quartered in the Citadel, came in. Every one admired our new platform very much, and as a most splendid moon shone down upon the St. Lawrence for the occasion, it really was very nice. The attractions of the platform almost emptied the drawing-room.

Tuesday, 20th.—In the afternoon we drove out, Lady Harriet, Mr. Coulson, and I. First we went over an asylum part of which is for old men and old women. The first old gentleman I saw said, “I was just coming up to see you. I come from Killyleagh.”*

At each side of the building are orphan asylums. We went over everything thoroughly, going up to the attics and down to the kitchens, and examining both the summer and winter clothing of the boys and girls.

Thursday, 22d.—The morning looked damp and uncertain, but we started on a picnic. A tandem, containing our second cook and our guide and commissariat officer, led the way. Lady H. and I followed in a barouche. D. and Colonel Fletcher rode. I must tell you that our “guide” is quite a character, and is of a most sanguine disposition: he declared the distance to the lake was only twenty miles, that there we should catch fish of enormous weights, that moose and bear and caribou would be shot by us in the bush, and, although it poured as we drove along, that the weather would be lovely "in half an hour."

D. thought seriously of turning back, but we voted for giving the sun another chance, and things soon looked much better. When we had reached the "twenty miles" we found we were about half way, and we stopped at a cottage to change carriages. The rest of the road was too rough for our barouche, so we got into the wagon with the tandem, while the cook set out in a cart. We gave the horses an hour to rest, while we sat in the garden and talked to the man and his wife. She was Scotch, and he a very good specimen of an Irishman. He had bought eighty acres for £100, but thinks a tenant in Ireland better off, in spite of his "rent." They both dread the long winters, and the heat of the summer.

They had such a nice dog with an extraordinary taste for putting out fires. When shown a lighted paper, he rushed at it, tried to extinguish it with his mouth, then had recourse to his paws, and, after succeeding, cooled his poor tongue with some clay or a stone.

When we reached our destination, we found our three tents pitched on the borders of Lake St. Joseph, which is ten miles long, and is surrounded by hills covered with woods. At sunset it was lovely; the hills becoming purple and blue, and the water looking like molten brass. Close to our encampment was a farmhouse, and a nice Irish family, all with charming manners—the father a magistrate.

Our guide had been beaming all day, and was radiant now that the weather looked better. He had shown us the tea-plant growing on the way, the saffron-plant, etc., and had told us a good deal about the country and the people. He sent us out with our rods to fish, while our dinner was being prepared. With us went Hammond (who had arrived before to pitch our tents), and a Mr. White, one of the afore-mentioned Irish family. We were just throwing out our first line, when Mr. White said, "There is a great storm coming: we must get under the trees." We jumped out of the boats, got under some bushes, and pulled a waterproof over us; a terrific storm, with tropical rain, came on, and, in spite of all precautions, we got quite wet. When it was over, we set off for our encampment. Our guide met us on the shore. His spirits were not damped, and when Colonel Fletcher inquired anxiously if the tents had let in any water, he replied, "Not a drop, Colonel; not a drop." On reaching them, however, we found every bed and blanket wet through! They had looked so nice and comfortable when we went out, and now all our possessions were soaking.

We lighted a fire,—for which the Whites sacrificed all their nice palings,—and surrounded it with the wet shawls, and beds, and bedding; then we pulled our table close to the warm blaze, and our cook sent us soup and entrées, and roasts and pudding, and we were quite happy. As soon as the things were dry we went to bed.

We had three tents. In the first we dressed; in the second D. and I had most comfortable little beds, and we crept through a hole to get to them. I procured a penknife to put under my pillow, to cut my way out in case of emergency, for in a panic I never could have found the hole. There was a faint possibility of a bear peeping in at it, and a pretty good chance of a pig committing the same indiscretion.

Friday, 23d.—The fire was crackling outside my tent when I awoke, and as soon as D. had dressed, I skipped across to the dressing-tent, and got ready for breakfast. The day was lovely, and we were all full of anticipation. Our guide appeared so radiant and so exactly the image of the celebrated "Mr. Briggs" in "Punch" that he now goes by that name among us. There he was, with his short coat, and a great wide-awake hat, on each side of which drooped an enormous long white cock's feather; the living picture of Mr. Briggs when he stated that "his heart was in the Highlands."

The gentlemen were to go into the bush with him, while we ladies were to fish. We had a very pleasant day, and caught fifty bass—a very good fresh-water fish, and an amusing one to catch. We came home to lunch, sat two hours in the sunshine, and went out on the lake again in the afternoon.

The other party, though unsuccessful, had great fun.

"Briggs," with his powder-flask round his neck, three or four guns, and several fishing-rods in the canoe, ordered his men to start. He recommended the gentlemen to take ten "rounds" of ammunition, which they did, though they feared there would be nothing to shoot, and they only wanted to see the "bush." Off they went, and as they rowed along Briggs would issue short and sharp words of command to Mr. White: "White, stop there and catch a trout." "White, we'll take a bass here," which they did not do, and then went on. They landed, and Briggs was to lead them to a small lake, on the shores of which he promised caribou. He had not gone ten yards before he cried, "Now, Colonel, we'll take a breath," and during the "breath" the poor Colonel was devoured by black flies, of which Briggs had previously declared there was not one. The walking was very severe, as there were great trunks of trees lying about, so covered with moss that the walkers did not see them until they stepped on the apparently solid ground, when they sank down between the branches of the fallen trees. Briggs's "breath"-taking became frequent, and D. soon began to fear, not only that Mr. Briggs had no notion of his way at all, but also that he was keeping himself up by rather too many “drops” of brandy; so a consultation was held, and they found that if they went on until the sun set, they would lose their way, and be unable to get out of the wood, so they thought seriously of returning. Briggs began to give more decided orders than ever. “White, go and get me a glass of water; do you hear, White?—go and get it directly, sir”—this when no water was to be seen anywhere; then, “White, go and find that lake—go on there, and you’ll find it, sir”; but Mr. White was afraid of being lost. Then Briggs lay down, called for his mosquito-curtain, and D. and Colonel Fletcher began to consider how they could get him home. They sent him a bottle of ginger ale (without any brandy), and soon after drinking that he pulled himself together, and they, steering by the sun, got out of the wood.

They were immensely amused, but Briggs was crest-fallen, and went to bed, and has never alluded to this expedition again. Our cook had shot us some snipe and squirrels, and gave us an excellent dinner: we tasted the squirrels, but they were strong of turpentine and were very nasty.

When something was said to Hammond about poor Mr. Briggs, he said, “And he turned out all hands this morning after the roosters to get those two feathers for his hat.”

Saturday, 24th.—We had our breakfast down on the edge of the lake, and sat a long time enjoying the sun; then we rowed over to the other side to see the pitcher-plant growing wild. We also saw a turtle found in the lake. At noon we started on our journey home. The views the whole way were lovely, and we stopped to lunch on the borders of the Jacques Cartier River, lighted a fire, and had broiled fish, etc.

During the tandem part of the drive we talked to Mr. Briggs, and he was very interesting, telling all his trade secrets. At the half-way house we were very well received, and the lady had baked us some fine plum-cakes, which she begged us to take home.

Monday, 26th.—D. held a levée, and was fully occupied till seven o'clock.

Tuesday, 27th.—In the afternoon we went to see the lunatic asylum here. It appears to be well managed, and is very clean.

In the evening we had a dinner of twenty-five people. Mr. Russell Gurney and Mr. W. H. Smith, M. P.* for Westminster, and Colonel and Mrs. Fessenden, Americans, were our strangers : the rest were all Canadians.

Wednesday, 28th.—Mr. R. Gurney and Mr. Smith breakfasted with us, and went over the University with D. We had another dinner; twenty people. At nine "Her Excellency" had a reception, to which all the people who had called were asked. Our platform was hung with Chinese lanterns.

Society is at present my business in life, and this is how my week is laid out: Monday, I remain at home to receive visitors. Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, we have large dinners. Friday we keep for sight-seeing, and Saturday we have small dinners. On the big nights we have a "drum." Hitherto we have enjoyed our dinners and parties very much ; the people are so pleasant and chatty.

There is a delightful old French lady here, Madame Duval, who thoroughly enjoys society and "drums." Unfortunately she is in mourning at present, and can not come unless I diplomatically suggest that the invitation is a "command." Mourning is kept here in the strictest manner, and I believe there is a time fixed for keeping down a thick veil—a time for paying mourning visits, etc., etc.

* The Right Honorable W. H. Smith, First Lord of the Treasury,

I was "at home" to visitors, and we had a very pleasant afternoon—a few people at a time, instead of the rush at an official gathering.

After dinner we had a drum, at which nearly the whole of Quebec appeared. They were cheery, and it went off well. I tried to have some singing, but there was too much talk. The band played, and, unluckily, finished its performance with "God save the Queen": the instant the familiar bars were heard, half-finished ices were thrown down and every one rushed away.

Thursday, September 5th.—Lady Harriet and I called at the Ursuline Convent. We took the babies, and I was more struck with the peculiarities of convent life than when we went through the establishment before; for, not having D. with us, we were not admitted, but had to talk to the nuns through iron bars. It was quite funny to hear them all buzzing inside their cage, laughing and talking, and handing sugar to the babies and admiring them! Luckily, they (the babies) behaved well, and both examined the curious scene with the utmost gravity.

Friday, 6th.—I was writing this morning when D. called me to see eight bishops, archbishops, and grands vicaires who had particularly asked for me. I went into the drawing-room, and found all these ecclesiastics in full dress. Our Grand Vicar as usual put every one at his ease, and initiated a lively conversation.

Immediately after lunch we started off in a small steamer to the other side of the river. We were met by Mr. and Mrs. Roberts, who came out with us in the Prus- sian, and they took us to the Chaudière Falls. We admired them very much. There is a great body of water, of a deep brown color, which tumbles down from a good height, and the waterfall is very wide; the cloud of white spray looks so pretty against the dark water.

We also went to see a very handsome new Roman Catholic church just built at New Liverpool. We found the priest—Father Saxe—a most superior old man, and very good-looking. He is proud of his church, and was pleased with our visit. He cultivates grapes and a garden, “which are his wife and children.”

Saturday, 7th.—In the evening we had a small dinner, and as soon as the gentlemen came up we had singing and playing. Mrs. Pemberton sang Irish melodies, and Madame Sericole French songs, and M. La Rue sang a little of everything, and then we had a number of Canadian boat-songs with choruses. They are very pretty, the music wild and plaintive. Our old friend, Madame Duval, was in great force, and she and her daughter dictated a song to M. La Rue which was rather amusing and pretty. She (Madame Sericole) sang, “I will be an eel in a pond to escape from you;” then he, “Si vous vous faites anguille, je me ferai pêcheur pour vous prendre en pêchant;” then she, “Si vous vous faites pêcheur pour me prendre en pêchant, je deviendrai alouette,” etc. This kind of conversation goes on to any length, till finally she says she will become a nun, when he makes himself “prêcheur pour vous prendre en prêchant.” This fidelity she is unable to resist, and, “Puisque tu m’aimes tant pour te faire prêcheur pour me prendre en prêchant, I will marry you.”

Monday, 9th.—Mr. and Mrs. T. Brassey * and Miss Robinson dined with us. He has just come from England in his yacht, a twenty-eight days' voyage; Mrs. Brassey came out in the steamer.

Wednesday, 11th.—The Bishop of Quebec and Judge Stuart came to breakfast, and at eleven we started on an educational tour. At the first school separate addresses were made to each of us, and I was asked for a holiday. The boys' schools seem almost all to be under the Christian Brothers. The Curé of Quebec went with us. He, like the other priests here, is very "jolly." I think we went to six schools; at each an address was read, and at each we gave a holiday. We also went to see the Houses of Parliament—that is, the local Parliament. Before the seat of Government was moved it was the imperial one. It is in good taste; the outside quite plain. After lunch we went with D. (who had not previously been there) to the lunatic asylum. We saw as much as we dared to see, and D. just escaped a cup of tea which one of the wildest of the patients threw through the holes in the door of her cell. After this we went to see some Egyptian curiosities, and I hurried home to rest for twenty minutes before my dinner. We had twenty-two people, the Brasseys among the number.

Thursday, 12th.—It is the experience of a very tired person you will now hear, for to-day must be added to yesterday to understand my feelings. We did not go out till two, for I was very busy all the morning; but at two we went down to the Convent of St. Roch, where our reception was most charming. The nuns received us at the door and led us into a very large room, the walls of which were lined from floor to ceiling with little children: they each wore either a blue or a red ribbon, and they were all from three to eight years old—five hundred in number. About twenty stood in the middle of the room and sang a song of welcome, and whenever they came to the word "Excellence," or "Milor," they all courtesied together. Then one came forward and made a little address, adding that this great occasion was worthy of "a double holiday." In his reply D. said that although he had never heard of that phenomenon in nature "a double holiday," he was happy to grant it. Then we went upstairs to see the older pupils. I can not tell you what a pretty ceremony it was, and how gracefully they all made their réverences together. We looked at the Church of St. Roch, which is a large and rather gaudy building. Then we proceeded to the boys' school of the district, and heard some singing, and received an address. We had a large dinner at night.

Friday, 13th.—To our duties again to-day, in spite of pouring rain. We began at ten, and visited the High School, which is a superior boys' school, and several other Protestant schools.

Monday, 16th.—We went to the Ursuline Convent and were received at the door by the Confessor and some other clergy, and by some of the official people in the parlor. We looked at pictures and at Montcalm's skull until all was ready, and then we went to the great door of the convent and knocked. Some nuns opened to us, and conducted us to a large room, where we found all the pupils dressed in white and with wreaths of flowers on their heads. They sang a welcome as we came in; then two came forward, and one gave a little address in English and one in French. All the time we were there waves of courtesies kept sweeping along the line every time our names were mentioned, and as we passed down the room. It was very prettily decorated. We made a tour of the convent, and heard the pupils play a piece on five pianos and a harmonium at once. We were admitted to the cells—cold and cheerless places—saw the great cage in which the pupils are inclosed when they see their parents, the dining-room with its meager furniture, the children's playground, and, in fact, all the sights of the convent. The nuns themselves we found most cheerful and happy.

In the evening we went to a ball given in our honor by the Lieutenant-Governor, Sir Narcisse Belleau. It was held in the music-hall, a very fine room. D. danced everything, and I danced the square dances.

Tuesday, 17th.—In spite of our fatigues, we had to start early to visit another convent, “Jésus Marie,” at Sillery. Here our reception was too lovely. The convent has only been built three years, and is a splendid house, with all the new improvements, and with fine grounds surrounding it. In one hall there are twelve glass boxes, each containing a piano, so that the pupils can practice simultaneously; while in another glass house sits the mistress, overlooking, but, happily for her, not overhearing. At the door we were met by priests, and by the Lady Superior, and we first of all paid our respects to the nuns—little black ladies with white, large-bordered caps. They conducted us through passages ornamented with maple-leaves, and placed us on thrones in presence of the pupils. The children were in white, and a circle of twelve of them began a dramatic conversation, in which they consulted each other as to the best way of doing us honor. One suggested that the “Genius of Canada” should be asked her opinion on the subject, and, like a good fairy, she immediately appeared upon the scene, and settled the question by giving me a large bunch of artificial roses made in the convent, singing meanwhile a song the refrain of which was—

“ Ce sont des roses sans épines,
Que l'on vous offre au Canada.”

The Genius was a pretty, fair girl, wearing a silver wreath and a white gown ornamented with maple-leaves and roses. After all this the nuns gave us cake and sweet wine, and we hurried off to another convent. It was a very small one, only just setting itself up, but there were about thirty pupils. On our way we went to look at a church, and called on Lady Belleau, and then rushed back to be "at home" all the afternoon.

I had my room full of people from three to six, so, as you may suppose, I was pretty tired when the hour for rest came.

D. and I dined alone, which is much more of an event now than a dinner-party would be.

Wednesday, 18th.—The day of our first ball. We were excessively busy making decorations, and attending to all the endless ball arrangements. Nevertheless, we had to go out to pay a state visit to the Université Laval. There we were received by the Archbishop, etc., and, after seeing the young boys, D. went through the building, museum, and library, and finally into the great room, where we were received by the University proper. We sat on a dais at one end, and the hall was filled with students, priests, and guests; the Rector and the Professors, in robes, walked in and read an address, and listened to D.'s reply. Then we went up on the roof, looked at the magnificent view, and peeped at the sun through a telescope. After this, home, where we partly rested and partly looked after the ball.

Our room has light-colored walls and a high arched roof, and we ornamented it with festoons of blue and white, fastened with great bunches of pink and white roses—the ceiling the same. We had a military band outside, where there was a very good floor, and a string band in the room; so people danced both outside and in, and they kept it up till three with great spirit. They really did enjoy themselves, which is encouraging, as we have another on Friday.

Thursday, 19th.—Gay people that we are! To-day we had a paper-hunt. We started at eleven, D. riding, and I taking two Frenchmen who are staying here—le Comte de Montebello and le Baron Brun—in the carriage. It poured at first, but cleared soon. We crossed the river in a ferry, carriage and all, and were told where to place ourselves; so we were much amused, as we saw the jumping perfectly. When the paper was "killed," we met at some country barracks, had lunch, and formed a "club," "the Stadacona Hunt," with D. as president.

Friday, 20th.—At twelve o'clock I went over a Protestant home, where orphans and old women have a refuge. It seems to be very nice and comfortable. After lunch we inspected an india-rubber manufactory, and saw the material from the time it comes out of the tree till it leaves the place as goloshes. Then we proceeded to a wood-mill, where all carpentering is done by machinery, and where we saw our Tadousac house laid out. It will be made there, and transported in barges to its site.

We had a second ball in the evening, and this time we had an awning on the platform, which was hung with Chinese lanterns. It looked very pretty, and it entirely prevented any crowd in the ballroom; in fact, it was almost the more popular place of the two.

Saturday, 21st.—H. E. had suggested some athletic sports, so we went down to see them and to lunch with the Mayor. There was a very good place for the games—a smooth field, surrounded by high grass banks on two sides, and with houses on the third. People sat on the banks and in the houses, and, as the day was lovely, there was an immense concourse of spectators.

The hills all round, as seen from our celebrated platform, are of the most lovely autumn colors, and, covered as they are with red and orange trees, they really look like flames in the distance, or like gigantic flower-gardens; for our trees are quite as brilliant as your best flowers, and if you can imagine your conservatory magnified a million times, and spread over miles and miles of hill and dale, you will begin to understand how we do things in this Canada of ours.

Monday, 23d.—We left Quebec to-day, and received quite an ovation at our departure. The weather was lovely, and we started from the Citadel at three, escorted by a guard of honor. The streets were hung with flags, and were full of people. At one corner, the boys of the Université Laval met us, and about fifty of them each presented me with a bouquet, so that I was half buried with flowers. When we arrived at the wharf, we found almost the whole of the society waiting to say good-by to us. The Mayor read an address, and invited us to a ball, and D. replied. Then we shook hands with every one, and went on board. Every part of the town, right up to the Citadel, was crowded, and six steamers full of people accompanied us for ten miles. When we got to Cap Rouge, the steamers turned back, the people on board cheering and waving their handkerchiefs. On the coast, too, at each little wharf, people were collected, and at the houses far up on the shore we saw waving flags and table-cloths. As we passed the Sillery Convent, all the children came out with flags. No wonder we like Quebec!

CHAPTER III.

ONTARIO.

Tuesday, September 24th.—The train left Montreal at 8 A. M., and we were in it till 11.30 at night—a very long journey. However, we had a most comfortable car, with arm-chairs and sofas, and managed to sleep a good deal. In spite of the lateness of the hour we were met at Toronto by crowds of people and a torchlight procession. The Lieutenant-Governor, Mr. Howland, took us to his house, which was magnificently illuminated.

Wednesday, 25th.—A large dinner-party and a very pretty ball, the house and grounds being illuminated.

Thursday, 26th.—At eleven o'clock we started by special train for Hamilton. It is a very prettily situated town on Lake Ontario, which looks more like the sea than a lake. All the streets are planted with trees, and there is a high hill behind the town, from which the view is magnificent. We were received at the station by the Mayor and Corporation, who presented an address, and drove to the Cattle Show yard, where there was another, and D. and I walked round the grounds and looked at the animals, while the people looked at us. We examined prize horses, cows, and pigs, but found the crowd so great that we resolved to return in the morning to see everything more quietly. We are staying with Mr. McInnes, who makes us very comfortable.

Friday, 27th.—We were at the exhibition early, and went round sewing-machines, pictures, refrigerators, stoves, vegetables, fruit, etc., etc.

After this we drove to the City Hall and received a deputation from the Six Nations. The chief “Chief” was finely dressed, and wore feathers in a hat, and many medals on his breast. He carried the silver pipe of peace, but also had on a scalping-knife, a tomahawk, and a dagger; and he was enchanted when, in allusion to these weapons, D. told him that he would rather have him for a friend than an enemy.

He was a fine-looking man, and had the best of manners. He read the address in English, the other chiefs standing by in plain clothes, and when D. replied, the Chief translated into Indian each sentence of his speech. As soon as the Indians left we had a general reception, and afterward drove out to a lovely country place belonging to Mr. McInnes. There we lunched, and then hurried off to the train.

In an hour and a half we reached Toronto, and the grand and official reception took place. A guard of honor and the Mayor met us at the station, and we drove to the Town Hall. All the streets were crowded with people, the windows full, and the houses ornamented with flags. There were some splendid triumphal arches, and the whole way along we were cheered. We made quite a procession, fire-engines and carriages leading the way for us. Another guard of honor met us at the hall, and we went in and had two more addresses. D. did not find his written replies at the station as he expected, so he had to speak extempore, and I think that pleased his audience more.

After this, we again got into the carriages and drove to the hotel through crowds, where we remained as the guests of the city. In the evening twenty of the Corporation dined with us. I sat by the Mayor, Mr. Sheard—a very nice man. After dinner we drove out to see the illuminations: there were some very pretty ones, and the arches looked beautiful.

Saturday, 28th.—The weather is quite splendid, and the Corporation took us for a drive. This town is one of those wonderful quick-growing places: the streets are very wide, and trees are planted on each side of them. There are some very handsome buildings and numbers of the most charming villas. On our return, we had lunch. Our health and the Mayor's health were drunk; and as the latter made frequent mention of me as D.'s "kind lady," I am in hopes I made an impression.

At three, D. had a levée, and after this we returned to Government House. Another dinner of twenty tonight.

We are thinking of spending a week at Niagara, and wrote to the hotel-keeper there to ask price of rooms, etc. He replied first to the business part, and then added, "I should like to know how many guests His Excellency will bring with him, as I wish to give a little hop while he is here, and I have to write for the music," etc., etc.

P. S.—"The hop and the music will not be charged extra"!

We declined the "hop."

Monday, 30th.—We have arrived at Niagara, and I write to you in sight of the Falls. The spray rises in clouds and joins the other clouds in the sky, which has a most curious effect, and there is a brilliant rainbow in the spray, and I am not in the least disappointed with the quantity of water, or with the size of the Fall; but I don't think the first view of it is so overpoweringly grand as I expected. The Fall is so wide that it rather takes from the height, and I imagine it is a sight the full grandeur of which will grow upon one day by day. Sir Hastings Doyle* is staying with us.

Tuesday, October 1st.—We went to a convent, accompanied by the Archbishop in violet. It has a beautiful view of the Falls from its windows. After lunch we crossed the bridge and went into the States.

From that side we had fine views of the rapids and great, rushing river, and there we prepared to visit the “Cave of the Winds.” I had no idea what the Cave really was, and was surprised to find that we were expected to array ourselves in yellow oilcloth trousers, with jackets and hoods of the same material. Thus accoutred we descended a flight of stairs, and found ourselves at the foot of a waterfall. On our feet we had soft cloth shoes, which enabled us to climb down the steepest and wettest and most slippery rocks. The spray beat in our faces, and we could only occasionally open our eyes to see the splendid rainbow in the water, and the great height above us from which the water was rushing down. We climbed in this way over rocks and small wooden bridges until we came to the Fall, and walked behind it, in a complete shower-bath; but I enjoyed it immensely. We came out at the other side, having passed behind a portion of Niagara. We did look a funny yellow party, dripping with water.

Thursday, 3d.—We were joined by Sir Edward Thornton, our Minister at Washington, and walked to the foot of the Horseshoe Fall, which spot, I think, gives a greater idea of the magnitude of Niagara than any other view. In the afternoon we drove to see the whirlpool and the rapids below the Falls, which are very rapid indeed.

We went by train to see a great engineering work undertaken by Mr. Gzowski.* He is making a bridge over the Niagara, close to Buffalo; the piers have to be built in water eighty feet deep, where the stream is rushing along twenty miles an hour. We saw the whole plan—but I will not attempt to describe anything so scientific. Colonel Fletcher put on a diver's dress and went down the eighty feet, bringing us some stones from the bottom.

Mr. and Mrs. Gzowski took us for a drive through Buffalo. There are miles of "street" there, arranged with the road in the middle, and on either side three rows of trees and a broad strip of grass, in the center of which there is a stone footpath. Each house is a handsome "villa," with a large piece of ground round it. One gets such an impression of wealth and comfort that one is astonished, and this is a "third-rate" American town.

Friday, 4th.—Sir Hastings Doyle left us to-day. We were very sorry to part with him, he was always so cheerful and such an amusing companion.

Toronto : Saturday, 5th.—We have hired a house at Toronto, and are settling ourselves in it to-day. There is a very bad epidemic among the horses here, and ours are suffering from it too, which is inconvenient.

Tuesday, 8th — We had our first Drawing-room. There were about 1,500 people present, and, as I had to courtesy all the time, I had plenty of exercise. The room looked very handsome when thus filled with smart people. This was quite a new experiment in Canada, drawing-rooms not having been held before, and it seems to be approved.

* Col. Sir Casimir S. Gzowski, K. C. M. G., Hon. A. D. C. to the Queen.

Wednesday, 9th.—Having recovered from the fatigues of the Drawing-room, I drove in the afternoon to see a lacrosse match. It is almost the national game here, and is a sort of ideal football. The ball is caught on a racket and thrown from one side to the other. It is very pretty and amusing to watch. The game was whites versus Indians. The latter showed us their war-dance before we left.

London: Thursday, 10th.—Our train left Toronto at 9 A. M., and on our way to London we stopped at Woodstock to receive addresses. The station at London was very prettily arranged. Immense numbers of people were present, and gave us a very warm reception. We drove to the Cattle Show yard, where there were more addresses, and where the people got over the palings and came in tremendous crowds all about us, so that we saw very little.

After lunch at the Members' house, Lady Harriet and I returned to the hotel, where the City entertained us, and D. went on to Helmuth College and to some oil-refineries. We dined alone, and just as we had finished a torchlight procession passed, throwing up Roman candles and rockets. Being dressed for the ball, I was requested to show myself to the guests in the hotel, and the American mistress of the place said to me, "Well, missis, I must compliment you very highly."

The ballroom was very fine, and His Excellency danced every dance.

Friday, 11th.—We started at eleven, with a large party "on board the cars," to visit the oil-wells of "Petrolia," where we saw the oil as it comes up through the pump—thick, black, and mixed with water. We also saw the process of looking for a well, "sinking a shaft," and all the machinery used. The oil leaves Petrolia free from water, but black and thick: the refining is done at London. The oil district is, of course, ugly, the ground black and swampy. Stumps of trees and wooden erections—some like enormous barrels—cover the whole place, but it was very interesting to see it. On our way back we were shown into a “drawing-room” car, where we found about twenty tables laid, each one for two people. We had an excellent hot lunch cooked on board, and got back to London at three o’clock. Here the party left us, and we returned to Toronto.

Saturday, 12th.—Lady Harriet and I inspected an orphan home, examining everything from garret to basement. On the way we passed a large house moving to some other site. It was on rollers, and was going slowly along the street.

A dinner-party closed the day.

Tuesday, 15th.—D. and I drove to see a fine Wesleyan church. In the same building, forming part of the architectural effect outside, but separate inside, there are Sunday-school and Committee rooms. Then we went on to Bishop Strachan’s Church of England Ladies’ School. We liked all we saw there very much. The girls played and sang and read to us, and as they had decorated their bedrooms we had to go into each one.

Wednesday, 16th.—At eleven our duties began again, and we visited the Normal and Model Schools. These are the National Schools of Canada, and members of all denominations met us, the English clergyman introducing the R. C. Bishop. This afternoon I have been to two orphan asylums, this evening to a charity concert.

Thursday, 17th.—My children and my brother Fred * sail for Canada to-day. H. E. and I went out at the usual hour of eleven, and paid a visit to Trinity College, one of the first-fruits of disestablishment here; it is especially a Church of England University. An address was read and answered, presentations were made, and we visited the library, which is young and small. Then we drove to the lunatic asylum and went over it. It is a very fine one, with broad corridors, widening out into comfortable recesses, in which the people sit. At each end of the passage is a covered quarter-deck, barred all round, but otherwise open to the air, where the inmates can walk, and which provides a perfect means of airing each floor. One new feature in this asylum is a paying department, which is of course cheap, although it has all the comforts of a private asylum. We had a dinner-party of twenty-four: one M. P. and his wife, two legal gentlemen, two R. C. bishops, a Volunteer colonel, the editor of a newspaper with his pretty little wife, who sang for us, some members of the Government, and some of the Board of Trade.

Friday, 18th.—D. and I drove to the City Hall to receive an address from the “York Pioneers”—Toronto used to be called “York,” and these are the first settlers here. After lunch we went to the University, where D. gave away the prizes, and made a speech. The hall was filled with all the beauty and fashion of Toronto: they complimented me, and D. complimented them, and the proceedings went off very well. This is a great place for presents—a very friendly custom. I have fruit, flowers, butter, fancy bread, fish, and game sent me constantly. Nearly every day brings some offering. The Show sent me apples and pears—a few of each kind, arranged so as to have some every day of the year.

Saturday, 19th.—In the afternoon I went for a sail with D., and in the evening we had a large party of about 150 people.

Monday, 21st.—This morning we inspected some Roman Catholic Schools. The first place we went to was the Convent of the “Precious Blood.” I think I told you about this order of praying nuns—it is very strict, and they use corporal self-punishments. The dress of the nuns is beautiful—a white dress, with a broad piece of blood-red colored cashmere hanging straight down both the back and the front of it, and a black veil on the head. Their beds are boards, and they get up twice in the night to pray. They looked very well, and quite merry. The second place was a college for boys, and the third a convent school. We also went to look at the cathedral.

There happened a great contretemps this afternoon. I was to be at home to receive visitors; so Lady Harriet and I sat in state, and nobody came! At five D. returned home, and I said to him, “Not a single soul has come to see us.” Tea came in, and he asked, “Has nobody called?” “Oh, yes,” said the servant, “but I said, ‘Not at home.’” We sent for the book, and found 104 people had been, so we had to sit down and write 104 notes to explain. I had a dinner-party in the evening, and, luckily, no one seems to have been offended, though our conduct did look rude this afternoon. We had a great deal of music after dinner. All the young ladies sing and play without their music, and are very good-natured about it.

Wednesday, 23d.—D. visited the National Schools in the morning, and after lunch I went with him to finish the Roman Catholic institutions. We drove to the Loretto Abbey Convent, where the girls were dressed in white and blue. They gave us a little concert, and then all passed round, each making a courtesy to us. We were laden with bouquets, and the rooms were ornamented with "welcomes" and wreaths of maple. The next place was a "House of Providence," where old, incurable, orphans, and sick, are all cared for. The third visit was to a boys' school under the Christian Brothers.

Thursday, 24th.—I went over the Toronto Hospital this morning—a fine building and well managed, but badly off for funds. D. was engaged to inspect two fashionable young ladies' schools, and is not home yet. To-night we have an enormous ball.

Friday, 25th.—Our ball last night was a great success. The Parliament buildings, in which it took place, were arranged for us by the Ontario Government. We had two ballrooms, both ornamented with a good deal of crimson drapery, arms and shields, which lighted up very well. The supper-room was upstairs. I suppose we had about 1,200 guests. There was not a hitch in the arrangements, and people looked very nice and fresh. I danced all the square dances, and D. every dance, with a selection of celebrities. When the programme was over, "God save the Queen" was played, and we stood on the daïs while the people passed out before us.

D. had to be off to a college at eleven this morning, but I was lazy, and reserved myself till one, when we went to the Law Courts to lunch. The building, "Osgoode Hall," is fine, and the courts much better than any I have seen—lofty and comfortable rooms. We had our healths drunk, and D. told them the one blot he had discovered in Canadian affairs was the lowness of the judges' salaries; this, of course, the company present were very glad to hear.

Saturday, 26th.—There were to have been athletic sports to-day, special trains, etc., but there is a steady downpour and they have been put off till Monday. I received a good many farewell visits, and in the evening we went to a performance at the theatre for the Protestant orphans. The theatre is small, but very pretty, and "London Assurance" was very well given—especially the part of Lady Gay Spanker, by Mrs. Morrison. She presented me with a splendid bouquet in which my monogram was made in shamrocks.

Sunday, 27th.—This morning, at ten, we visited a Sunday-school. Very great attention is paid to Sunday-schools in Canada, and the children of all classes attend them. There was a separate room for infants, and the man teaching them gave his instruction orally and with a blackboard, upon which he wrote: the children answered all together, and seemed bright and intelligent. They also sang hymns. The larger children were down-stairs. D. made them a little address, and we heard them sing too, which they do extremely well. This was the cathedral school, and the average attendance every Sunday is 500. There is a class every week for the teachers, and the same lesson is given all over the school.

Monday, 28th.—We left Toronto at nine, and a number of people came to see us off, and cheered our departing train. We had a twelve hours' journey, and were glad to reach Ottawa.

Ottawa : Tuesday, 29th.—My poor children have had a very long journey: they arrived at Quebec on Monday, after a rough passage from Liverpool, and did not get here till this evening, when I devoted myself to giving them tea, putting them to bed, and hearing them chatter.

Wednesday, 30th.—The weather is perfectly lovely, and the children are well and enjoying the fine day.

Mr. Coulson goes on leave, so Fred at once begins his duties as A. D. C., but he comes in for a time of rest.

OTTAWA.

Saturday, November 2d.—The journal here will grow very dull, I fear. We are “settling down,” and do very little that is interesting.

Ottawa is a small town, with incongruously beautiful buildings crowning its insignificance. A very bad road leads to Rideau, which is a long, two-storied villa, with a small garden on one side of it and a hedge which bounds our property on the other—so that at this time of the year there is really no place to walk. When the “road-maker,” as they call the frost, comes, and when the ground is covered with snow, we shall be independent of roads; and the knowledge of this makes the inhabitants careless of the state they may be in at other times of the year.

The gentlemen try to ride every day, and come back covered with mud. I walked into the town one day with D., and the following paragraph appeared in the evening paper:

“Lady Dufferin.—It would astonish some of our fine ladies to see Lady Dufferin walking about the town. She dresses plainly and sensibly, wears thick boots, and does not shrink from the muddiest of our crossings.”

This comes of my Irish training!

Monday, 4th.—Directly after lunch, Fred and I began our duties. I was "at home," and he announced the visitors and helped me to talk to them. We had 108. I was pleased with the society, and Ottawa itself improves on acquaintance, especially as I have discovered a nice common and wood behind the house, where the children will be very happy. Mr. Archibald,* Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba, and the Pattisons dined with us.

In addition to his social duties, Fred has to look after all the stable matters, expenditure included, after the invitations, the amusements, such as skating-rink, etc., etc., so he is not idle.

Tuesday, 5th.—The little ones, Basil and Hermie, arrived from Quebec, looking well and merry. It is nice to be all together again.

Saturday, 9th.—The weather is lovely, and I generally walk in and out of town. After lunch, games of football, stilts, hoops, etc., go on. We have five-o'clock tea, and family gatherings, the babies first, and then the old children.

The house gets on very slowly; the hall door is still boarded up, the schoolroom full of workmen who do not work, the gas-pipes still innocent of gas. I suppose we shall be settled by January. The Fletchers' house will, I hope, be ready for them in a few days, and when they get into it we shall feel more settled ourselves. At present they are staying with us.

Sunday, 10th.—We went to our very small parish church at New Edinburgh. It is very primitive, but we like the service, and it is so much nearer to us than the cathedral.

Monday, 11th.—We took a walk to prepare for the labors of the afternoon. Between three and five I received 144 visitors; Fred, Lady Harriet, and Mrs. Pattisson helping me.

* Sir Adams George Archibald, K. C. M. G.

Thursday, 14th.—This is Thanksgiving Day, so we went to church at the cathedral, but (as the papers tell us) we did it in an “unostentatious manner.” The first snow fell.

Friday, 15th.—A telegram arrived from Australia, the first which has been sent direct: it arrived at 9.10 this morning, having been sent at 10—to-night. Rather puzzling to think of. D. replied, “Canada re-echoes Australia’s toast—our Queen and a United Empire.”

Sunday, 17th.—A beautiful ideal winter day: the ground and trees white with snow, blue sky, and bright sun. We went to church, and the children were unable to resist some of the pleasure of a first day of snow, and tumbled about in it as though it were sand.

You should see them all five in blanket coats, which are made of thick blue cloth, with red epaulets and sashes, and pointed hoods lined and piped with red. The coats are very long and straight, and the little figures in them look both funny and picturesque. They have sealskin turbans, and pull up the hoods if necessary. We all wear moccasins on our feet; they are of cloth, with india-rubber soles, and generally with a flower embroidered in colors on the toes. The only drawback to going out here is the amount of dressing one has to do to prepare for it. There are over-stockings, over-boots, over-etc’s. of all descriptions to be put on; there are fur caps with woolen clouds tied over them as becomingly as possible, fur coats, fur gloves, muffs, etc., etc. But once out it is delightful, and most exhilarating.

We have been tobogganing, though the snow is not deep yet, and our present efforts are very amateurish. We sit, stand, or lie on a straight board which is curled up at one end, and slide down snow-covered hills. The children enjoy it immensely, and have splendid exercise pulling their little sleighs, or toboggans, up the hill again.

The "Black Rod," Mr. Kimber, was one of our guests at dinner to-night. He sang us one of Figaro's songs, acting it with great spirit, and amusing us very much. He also sang some very pretty Canadian boat-songs. Another guest was Miss Griffin, a lady who acted in a play with Dickens at Montreal twenty years ago.

Wednesday, 20th.—D., Colonel Fletcher, Fred, and Mr. Campbell (D.'s short-hand writer, and a very favorite member of the Staff), went to Montreal.

Saturday, 23d.—I had a long letter from D., giving me an account of his doings. After a long journey on Wednesday, they reached Montreal in the evening, and were conducted by the Mayor and Sir Hugh Allan to the latter's house.

On Thursday D. unveiled the Queen's statue, and in the evening he danced all night at a ball, never flagging till four in the morning, and being pronounced "a brick" by the young ladies of Montreal. He had a dinner at a club on Friday, and returned here to-day, fatigued but pleased. We are both going to Montreal in January for a "season."

Wednesday, 27th.—We are gradually settling down in our house, and are dragging from obscure packing-cases the few ornaments that have emigrated with us. I have set up a boudoir, and in it I put all my favorite things, so as to have one home-like sanctum. The state-rooms continue, I fear, to have a hopelessly company look.

We had a dinner-party of twenty-six, a great number of Ministers among them. There is no clock (going) in the drawing-room, so my guests fidgeted off before ten, and had to wait in the cloak-room for their carriages.

When one person moves, they all go, and it is useless to say, "Do stay."

There was snow in the afternoon, and we are getting up the double windows. Most people have not only the extra windows, but stuff cotton wool into every crevice. Their houses are very hot.

Tuesday, December 3d.—Yesterday I went for my first drive in a sleigh. I think I shall like it very much when there is a little more snow: it is rather rough at present.

I will tell you how we pass an ordinary day. We breakfast at nine, then separate to our various offices and places of business. Fred goes to the stables, and afterward helps to write invitations, though Mr. Coulson manages the society at present. At eleven they all go into town. We lunch at one—the children and I generally alone, the gentlemen returning when they like. After lunch we go out: in this weather it is a duty, but later, I think, we shall have great fun out of doors. On our return we have tea, and books, and children; dinner at 7.30. The Fletchers come often, and we have either one or two large dinners every week.

Wednesday, 4th.—I put on snow-shoes for the first time. One's foot looks like a dot in the center of a large racket, and I expected to trip up on my own shoes; but I found it quite easy to walk with them, and very amusing. Without them one has to keep in the middle of the beaten track on the roads, but with them one can walk on the deepest snow.

Friday, 6th.—Sir John and Lady Macdonald are staying with us for two nights. In the morning I took Lady Macdonald and Lady Harriet for a sleigh-drive, and in the afternoon we all rested for the coming dinner-party. We had twenty-eight guests.

One of them, a senator and mill-owner employing 500 laborers all the year round at high wages, told me that when he came here himself he earned ten shillings a month. Mr. Tod, the librarian here, was another guest. He is the author of the best book on the British Constitution. Then there was a railway celebrity, a very nice man, who got out of a sick bed to come: he brought with him a pleasant sister-in-law and a very pretty daughter. Sir Hugh Allan also dined with us, and Sir Francis Hincks.

Saturday, 7th.—Lady Macdonald left, and I went out to see some tobogganing. The high hill is sufficiently covered with snow now, and the children are very brave about going down it. They start at the top and go bumping and jumping all the way down, sometimes tumbling over into the snow at the bottom, and sometimes going along the level ground for a good distance. To-day they looked so odd, all covered with snow, while the gentlemen's beards, eyelashes, and hair, had the snow frozen into them. The thermometer was 10° below zero, but the day was bright, and we did not feel the cold at all. Toiling up the hill and pulling the toboggan after one, is hard work.

Monday, 9th.—One of my exhausting “at home” days. My labors began at 1.30, for I had the managers of a concert I am getting up to lunch, and went on till six—a steady flow of visitors. It was a very cold day—luckily for the conversation required of me—and ninety-three varieties of “How cold you must have found your drive!” did I invent. On these occasions D. comes in when all is over and asks “what news we have heard,” and we always have to say that we have heard nothing. I generally keep Monday evening sacred to repose, but to-day we were obliged to invite travelers, and two Torontonians, the Pattisons and Fletchers making up twelve. Our tourists came to America for ten months, but have found traveling so very expensive that they have to hurry home at the end of four. Their bill for ten days at a New York hotel was 150*l.*

Tuesday, 10th.—D. had invited these young men to come and toboggan, and it made me freeze to look at their costume: knickerbockers, no gloves, thin boots, English hats!—when flannel, and cloth trousers, boots of cloth with india-rubber soles, fur gloves, and fur hats are necessary. I only hope they won't be laid up with “pains.” One foolish footman of ours who came out in the carriage with cotton socks and leather boots, has had a fearful attack of acute inflammatory rheumatism, and two Sisters of Mercy are now nursing him. Yesterday, Terence, having a hole in one of his gloves, came home with his finger frost-bitten, and Nelly had two suspicious white spots in her face: they were rubbed with snow, and are all right.

Wednesday, 11th.—I had half an hour's skating: the first time we have been able to use the rink. The weather was very cold, but bright, and the snow hard and dry. I did not do much, as we had a dinner in the evening, for which it is necessary to be fresh.

Saturday, 14th.—This has been one of our regular Ottawa weeks. After the Wednesday's dinner a quiet night; then a visit from a Minister and his wife, Dr.* and Mrs. Tupper, who remained the night; and a visit the next night from two Ministers and one wife—Monsieur Langevin, and Mr. and Mrs. Howe; these latter preferred returning home to sleep, either because they liked their own stove side, or because the next day was Mr. Howe's seventieth birthday. He was a violent politician, but is less active now, and is talked of as a probable Lieutenant-Governor for Nova Scotia.

We are working at our out-door rink, and find it rather troublesome to manage. An Englishman exclaims, "Flood it!" but this is just the difficulty, for the water freezes as it touches the ice, and will not "flood it"; and if, by having a circle of barrels round the space and upsetting them all at the same time, we do succeed in covering it with water, and go happy to bed dreaming of beautiful ice and a capital skate, we wake in the morning to find either that it has snowed, or that the wind has blown old snow over the rink, which a ray of sunshine having partially melted, has stuck hard to our lovely ice, and there we are longing to skate and obliged to begin "au déluge" again.

Wednesday, 18th.—We had a ball. The room was well lighted and looked well, the supper (by the new cook) was very good, and I hope every one was happy. Sir Hugh and Miss Allan arrived for it, and remain till Saturday! Colonel Fletcher was told that "Mr. Hamilton will be spoiled here, people like him so much."

Friday, 20th.—A great snowstorm. I was to have gone to a mission service in church, but I could not face the weather. D. did go, and afterward inspected the Christian Brothers' school, received addresses, etc.

Monday, 23d.—This morning we visited the Grey Sisters, and saw their school. Then I came home and arranged my concert-room with stage, etc.

The Belgian Minister at Washington arrived in time for an early dinner, and is staying with us. At eight the singers arrived, and began to dress, and at 8.30 the listeners came pouring in, were cordially greeted by His Ex. and Her Ex. at the door, and were seated by obliging A. D. C.'s and secretaries.

The music began at nine—it really was very good, and the acting admirable! The costumes were perfect, and every one was delighted with the two hours' amusement.

I allowed the three children to be present, and they enjoyed it immensely. Terence was in fits over "Figaro," and in great anxiety the whole time to understand everything. We had supper at eleven, and the whole entertainment was considered a great success.

Tuesday, 24th.—Oh! this really is cold; two ears, two faces, two knees, and one finger frozen in our family. We are 22° below zero, and are devoted to our clouds, in which we wallow. In spite of this we skate, but we are very thankful to think that we are feeling the worst cold we need expect here.

Christmas Day.—Thermometer 20° below zero. Proprieties out of the question—must go to church in seal-skin turbans, and must undress when we get there, as we sit near the stove; so that when we leave, the amount of things to be put on is frightful. There are my cloak, and my cloud, fur gauntlets, and woolen cuffs; there are Archie's coat, and his cloud, and turban, and gloves. Then Fred and D. have to be clothed; happily, every one in the church is equally busy muffling up. D., you will be surprised to hear, wears absolutely less than he used to do in May at home, and scarcely seems to feel the cold at all. Fred, too, bears it well, with the exception of his ears, about which he is decidedly nervous. He is always feeling them and inquiring from passers-by whether they are frozen. The children play in the snow as if it were hay, and enjoy themselves immensely. Their nurse, Mrs. Hall, dislikes the wrapping up, but has been consoled by a present of a pair of skates. Their governess is learning too; she won't wrap up, and I really fear some accident for her: nothing but a frost-bite will make her careful.

We have arranged a Christmas-tree, and this evening all the children of the family assembled for it. They came at five, and the nine of them, with their governesSES and nurses, were ushered into the room with great ceremony. Hermie rushed at a doll. "There is my doll," and kissed it most fervently. Of course they all got various presents, and the big ones dined with us, and afterward played blind man's buff, snapdragon, etc., etc.

The pictures have arrived, and are a great improvement to the house. In my room I have drawings of Killyleagh and Clandeboye, and there are a few oil-portraits in the dining-room, which make it look home-like. We shall be quite sorry to go away next week, to undertake a long journey in the snow, and to be a month in hotels.

Mr. Pattisson's Irish cook came to tell him that, having had her hand severely burned and blistered by lifting a cold iron pot, she would go home by next steamer. He pretends there is not one to go in.

Friday, 27th.—We continue every day to practice our skating. I can get on very well with ordinary skating. D. can go backward and do the figure of eight. Fred is beginning the outside edge, and is studying the art with great care. The children are not industrious: they find making snow houses and tobogganing much more amusing than lamely shuffling over the ice, so I think they will be long in learning.

Saturday, 28th.—This morning we visited the "Congregation de Notre Dame," an educational convent, where Nelly was shown a Christmas-tree, and told to choose what she liked best on it. In spite of my nudges, truth would out, and she took a very pretty doll instead of the insignificant present I was trying to suggest to her.

Directly after lunch I went down to the Rink to receive my skating-party. It went off extremely well. Some of the young people skated most beautifully, Miss Patrick and Miss Kingsford, two very pretty girls, being the best performers. Skating is so very graceful when well done, and the scene on the Rink is so gay; every one moving about so fast on the ice, and knots of people tobogganing down the hill behind. I had on my skates, but did not feel equal to skating before such experts.

When it became cold, we came into the house, drank tea and mulled claret, and danced for an hour. We intend to repeat these parties once a week. The dancing was quite a surprise this time, but of course it will be expected now, and parcels of shoes and various decorations will be brought next Saturday, which were dispensed with on this occasion.

Monday, 30th.—I think the pleasures of sleighing are exaggerated; it appears to me much the same as driving in a cart. You have no springs, and the snow gets into hard, rough ruts. This is treason: one ought to be enthusiastic over its delights. The bells and the red plumes on the horses' backs are the best of it, I think.

Wednesday, January 1, 1873.—New Year's Day is kept here as a visiting-day. All the ladies stay at home, and all the gentlemen visit. D. and I were "at home" from three to five and received 293 men.

It was a most lovely day, warm and bright, with only ten degrees of frost, which seems to us quite like a thaw! With the exception of a few days at Christmas, we have been perfectly comfortable: the house is so warm, and we are so well wrapped up when we go out, that we can not feel cold.

CHAPTER V.

MONTREAL.

St. Lawrence Hall : Sunday, January 5th.—We left Rideau yesterday, had dinner at Prescott, and reached Montreal at night. A very successful winter journey, for had the snow been troublesome we might have been days en route. The Mayor met us, and we drove to this hotel, where we have taken rooms for a month. Our own cook and servants arrive early in the week and arrange everything, while we go down to Quebec for a ball. The rooms we have here are very clean, but very hotel-like, stiff and starch, and I shall not feel much at home when I receive my guests in them.

Monday, 6th.—We went early to the Rink, which we were curious to see. It is a great place, 250 feet long, of smooth, dull-looking ice, which reminds one of wax, and which is covered with scrapings cut off by the skates; there is a raised walk round the ice for non-skaters, and a gallery at one end. The roof is arched. Most of the skaters were children of four years old and upwards, going backwards and forwards, Dutch rolling, making eights—looking as if they had been born on skates. There was only one young lady there, very pretty and a splendid performer. Her skating is the most beautiful, graceful thing one can see. Skating is particularly pretty for ladies, as the dress hides the machinery which is visible when men skate. An in-door rink is dull, however, I think, compared to skating out of doors.

We went down to the station at 11 P.M. D. and I had two good bedrooms, and the others had beds in a Pullman car. Mrs. Dent had a sofa in the sitting-room, and His Ex.'s short-hand writer, finding he was expected to occupy a couch opposite to my fair maid, shyly jumped into it with his hat on, which I suppose he considered gave an air of respectability to the proceeding. Dent was giggling at him under her rug, and was still more amused when, later, the hat of propriety rolled off, and the little man pulled his clothes right over his head.

Tuesday, 7th.—We awoke in time to have a cup of tea at a passing station, and arrived at Quebec at twelve.

The morning was lovely, and the Citadel, the river, and Quebec looked so picturesque, with the sun shining on the snow. We crossed in the steamer, cutting through ice, and were accompanied by the Mayor. We drove up to the hotel over the most bumpy roads—the snow is in great mounds, and the jump from one hill to another is quite amusing: it is like hunting on wheels. The warm reception we met with was very pleasant.

We went to the Rink after breakfast. The band was playing, and there was some very good skating, but too many children, who get in the way and make beginners nervous.

Wednesday, 8th.—This morning we again went to the Rink, where D. is practicing hard, aided by all the young ladies of Quebec, who give him lessons in turn. In the afternoon we opened a poultry show, and I examined each scrubby fowl, and made the most of my home experience. This place in winter is not suited to poultry, and their plumage shows that they are shut up in stables.

The Citizens' Ball took place to-night. It is one given for us by the city, and for which we were invited to return when we left in the autumn. It was a splendid entertainment. The room was decorated with our colors, and with wreaths of roses, and there was a large reception committee, who took great care of me all the evening.

Thursday, 9th.—An excursion to Montmorency was arranged for to-day, but I did not go. At noon, forty-two sleighs, each driving a tandem, came to the door, and D. got into the first in a snowstorm. The weather cleared later, and they drove twelve miles, had lunch, visited the Fall, and were back by dusk. They enjoyed it very much, though they came in very cold.

D. and I dined alone, and then went off to a skating ball. The Rink was lighted up, and hung with flags and lanterns, and there were regular dancing programmes. It was a very pretty sight. I can't conceive anything more graceful than the lancers skated; waltzing also is pretty, but few people, even here, can do it. I had a very comfortable seat, and sat there with a never-ceasing stream of figures passing before me.

D. skated a good deal at the ball, and Fred took some turns with the young ladies hand-in-hand round the place, but they did not dance. I went round twice, but am not a good enough skater for these public demonstrations.

Friday, 10th.—After some skating, I proceeded to the grating at the Ursuline Convent to thank the nuns for some lovely specimens of their work, which they sent me as a New Year's gift. Then I came home and "received" farewell visits. All at Quebec, both in "society" and in the streets, are so nice to us—they are very home-like. We left the hotel in the evening, crossed the river, and had our special car, in which we first had tea and whist, and then we went to bed; while Fred and Mr. Coulson attended "a party" in the next carriage.

Saturday, 11th.—We arrived at Montreal in time for breakfast, skated, and had interviews with the Mayor and various officials, but our work only begins on Monday.

Monday, 13th.—D. visited a hospital, the Law Courts, and some churches after lunch. In the evening we had a Drawing-room. There were about 1,000 people at it.

Tuesday, 14th.—We skated and visited a school in the morning, and at night had our first dinner here—twenty-eight people: Bishop Oxenden and his wife, the Mayor and his wife, and others. Our drawing-room is small for so many, but they left early, as we were going to a ball at a Mons. Papineau's—the first private entertainment I have been to in Canada. His wife must have been handsome, with brown eyes and white hair powdered. They have a pretty house, and the ball was pleasant.

Wednesday, 15th.—This evening we attended a snow-shoe torchlight procession given in our honor. At eight o'clock the president of the society came for us, and we drove out until we met the "snow-shoes." They wore white blanket coats, tight leggings, and red caps, and the sight really was very picturesque and very Canadian: the bright night, the snow-covered ground, hundreds of sleighs and thousands of tinkling bells, the torches, and the gayety of the whole scene, were delightful. The procession walked up the mountain, and we drove round it, watching the fiery serpent winding among the trees. The roads were excellent, and it was the first sleigh-drive I have really enjoyed. In about an hour we arrived at a house where supper was prepared, and where we had a very amusing evening. There was a long list of toasts, and a song with a chorus was sung after each.

There was the usual amount of compliments to the country, to us, to the Mayor, to everybody. Canada was the finest country, the Canadians the finest people, His Excellency worthy to be a Canadian, Her Excellency most excellent, the Mayor admirable, the Mayor-ess most hospitable, our hosts . . . words failed! When the Mayor got up to return thanks, he said that "As Canadians, we have one fault—we are too fond of praising ourselves; but in this case it is sincere." When all was over, we got into our sleigh again, and the fresh air was delightful! The snow-shoers were by this time "jolly good fellows," and I found them rather alarming to our horses and to me; so we begged them not to accompany us home, and I think they were not sorry to return to the supper-room.

Thursday, 16th.—I may tell you, once for all, that we spend the morning in the Rink.

This afternoon we visited a Catholic commercial school—really a well-arranged building. The boys have a very good string band, and between addresses we had some music.

We had a large dinner in the evening: Sir Francis and Miss Hincks were of the party. I fear it was not lively, but what can one do in a small room with thirty strangers?

Saturday, 18th.—After our morning skate we came home in a snowstorm, and then out again to a benevolent institution where old women and orphan children are lodged, and the latter educated. We had tea with the Bishop and Mrs. Oxenden. They have a very nice house, and they had collected a little party to meet us; but we had rather to hurry away, as it was snowing hard, and we had to dress for a dinner-party. It was to have been a small one, but stretched out to twenty-four, and was, I thought, the pleasantest we have had here.

Monday, 20th.—This was rather a hard day. Sir Hugh Allan and M. Delfosse came to breakfast at nine, and D. went off to be photographed for a paper dollar immediately after. At eleven we proceeded to the Rink, and only returned for His Ex. to receive an address from the Board of Trade.

When that deputation was dismissed, we drove to a Protestant deaf-and-dumb institution, which was a very good one; but it was the wrong one as far as I was concerned, as that I wished to see was the Catholic establishment, where the deaf-mutes are taught to speak.

A refuge for old people was the next institution on our list, and we only got home for a short rest before a big dinner. I enjoyed the evening, and some nice people dined with us.

Tuesday, 21st.—Miss Allan came to lunch with me, and D. and I drove in state to M'Gill College. Here our horses were taken out by the students, and we were dragged up to the door. Speeches were made, and we were shown everything of interest; but while D. was taken to the dissecting-room, I went to have tea with the ladies. D. afterwards visited the Normal School by himself. We dined with the Mayor, and as we stepped out in the snow to get into a great, lumbering, covered sleigh, we greatly rejoiced that the most of our Canadian gayeties are in our own home.

The Mayor has a nice house, and there was a splendid display of flowers on his table; in fact, I believe he had bought every flower in Montreal for the occasion.

Wednesday, 22d.—I stayed at home the whole day, and disappointed the Jesuits, whom His Ex. went to see, and who sent me magnificent bouquets. They have a fine church and college here, and are celebrated for their music.

We had (of course) a dinner-party. D. took in a bride, and I had a senator and a judge on either side of me.

Thursday, 23d.—At ten D. went to a military school, and had the rest of the day for amusing himself with skating and curling. We had another large dinner: 130 people will have dined with us this week, most of whom are quite new acquaintances.

Friday, 24th.—There was a tremendous snowstorm to-day, but we had an appointment to visit "Monklands," a large educational convent some distance from the town, so we had to make the best of our way there, and really experienced something of a snowdrift: in places it was quite difficult for the horses to drag the sleigh along, and they were "floundering" about, while the coachman was shading his eyes from the snow, and we all had to cover our faces and take as much care of ourselves as was possible.

"Monklands" used to be the Governor-General's house when the Government was at Montreal. I believe the situation is fine, but it must have been too far from the town for a Government House. It has been enlarged, and now contains 22 nuns and 150 pupils.

After seeing the nuns and the household arrangements, we were ushered into the "theatre," or school-room, where a stage presented itself to our view, upon which the 150 young ladies, dressed in white, were courtesying, and whence proceeded sounds of harps, pianos, and harmoniums. The usual pretty little entertainment followed, and D. and I both answered addresses.

When this was over, poor "His Ex." had to visit a college; but, in mercy to myself, the horses, and the men-servants, I came straight home.

We had a small dinner, and were tolerably merry. One of our young ladies turned out to be a "blue-stocking," and amused us much by laying down the law to the company.

Saturday, 25th.—I took a drive along the river to prepare for the labors of the afternoon, being "at home." We began to receive at three, and had a stream of visitors till 5.30. I had not much time except for shaking hands, and all my conversation was "How do you do?" "How cold you must be!" "Good-by!" A funny little American woman, traveling alone with her maid, came and looked in at the door to see me; then she thought she would come in, so she went home and changed her hat for her bonnet and returned. She asked for "my husband," and invited us both to Philadelphia. She looked small and thin enough to blow away, and Fred found her afterwards almost fainting from the exertion of her visit.

Monday, 27th.—After skating, I brought Miss Allan back to lunch, and we went to a chemical lecture. It was given to ladies, and I am patroness of the association. I then went on to the Protestant Infants' Home. D. visited the Montreal Waterworks.

We had a dinner of thirty-six—our last here. The children arrived at midnight, looking extremely well.

Tuesday, 28th.—We all went to visit a large convent called Hochelaga. It is a fine building, and contains a very beautiful chapel copied from one in Rome. We heard the organ played and the novices sing.

In the evening there was the "citizens'" ball given in our honor. There was an excellent ball-room, with an enormous supper-room off it. An arrangement was made at one end of it, like the canon's stall in a cathedral: these were lined with green, and decorated with the antelope and heart, our motto, etc., etc.; in each a chair, but only one stall was used all the night, and that by me. The whole room was ornamented with flags and "V. R.s" and "D.s," and was very pretty. There was a state quadrille first, of enormous length, reaching the whole way down the room, and with us and the Mayor alone at the ends. I enjoyed my share of the evening very much, and danced all the squares before supper, leaving very soon after. An official list of partners was made out for D., and he remained dancing with dowagers until four o'clock in the morning.

Wednesday, 29th.—D. had relaxation to-day, skating and curling, and I did some business, and went over the R. C. Deaf-and-dumb Institutions.

These were very interesting, as the poor creatures are being taught to speak, and very successfully too. There are separate establishments for the boys and girls, and the master showed us the whole system of teaching.

This is a cold, bright day, 20° below zero.

I spent the evening with the children, D. and staff having gone to a night-tobogganing party and dance. The former returned at twelve, and the young ones not till nearly three. They enjoyed it, but thought it a dangerous amusement in the dark, and Mr. Coulson had the sleeves completely cut out of his coat by a toboggan coming down on the top of him.

Thursday, 30th.—The fancy-dress skating ball took place in the evening, and was a most beautiful sight, besides being great fun.

We drove to the Rink wearing morning dress, and went out on a balcony to look down upon the scene. It was like a fairy pantomime of gigantic size, and was most striking. The building was hung with flags and Chinese lanterns, and from one end to the other there were gayly-dressed figures of every sort and variety moving about with that easy, graceful swing which belongs to skating. When we went downstairs we were conducted to the farther end of the Rink, where a platform and chairs at the edge of the ice were prepared for us.

Here we stood, while the two sets of "state" lancers were danced in front of us. One was a poudré set: each couple skated in, bowed to us as they passed, and took their places. I think I have already told you how beautiful the lancers are when skated, and you can imagine how the addition of costume increases their beauty: I never saw anything half so pretty. When they were over D. and Fred put on dominoes, and skated off too. I collected a few friends under my canopy, the children sat on the edge of it, and we were amused the whole evening watching the different characters as they came before us. There was one delightful old gentleman who passed us every round in some different way, acting capitally the whole time. There was an excellent and large monkey, who performed for the children. There were Indians and Chinamen, cavaliers, etc., etc. The ladies' costumes had of necessity short petticoats, so there was every variety of peasant—Dolly Vardens, Watteaus, etc., etc.—and very pretty they were! In fact, to an ordinary fancy ball you have to add perpetual motion—for no one ever stands still on the ice. The spectators lined the walls. We were torn away to have some supper, and after it I sat on the upper balcony to see the general effect. They danced another set of lancers, and "Sir Roger de Coverley." I am sure that if they had not turned the Governor-General out, by playing "God save the Queen," I never should have been able to get him away, he enjoyed it so much.

Friday, 31st.—D. visited the blind-schools, and, from his account of them, I was quite sorry not to have gone with him. He was so touched by a little blind child feeling his face all over with her tiny fingers to feel what he was like.

Saturday, February 1st.—We went this afternoon to see some snow-shoe races, and, for the first time since we have been in Canada, we were all thoroughly cold, and were glad when it was over.

In the evening some games in the Rink were very amusing. One sport looked dangerous: it was a hurdle-race, and the skaters had to jump over stiff barriers placed in their way. Numbers of them caught their feet on the top bar, and came down; it was wonderful that they escaped being seriously hurt. The funniest race to watch was the barrel-race: a number of flour-barrels without ends were placed at intervals along the course. The first row had the same number of barrels as boys; the second and the third sets had fewer, for the competitors got separated and did not all reach the barrels at the same time. Each boy dived down when he reached the barrel, crept through it, and skated on, as fast as possible, to the next. Of course the barrels rolled and tumbled about on the ice, and some boys were much quicker at getting through them than others. There were also backward races, and girls' races, and boys' races, etc., all on skates. I gave the prizes at the end.

Monday, 3d.—In the morning we went to the Rink, and, a small band of music having been obtained, there were lancers danced, and waltzes, and every one worked hard, some because they skate for the prizes to-morrow, and some because it was to be our last day there.

We went to an Irish concert after dinner. All the songs were Irish, and there was a little speechifying between times.

Tuesday, 4th.—It thaws to-day, and is consequently horrid, but we are all full of excitement about the skating-matches this afternoon. Quebec has sent a champion lady, and has told her she need not return to her ancient city if she does not win the locket which D. has offered as a prize.

Later.—The ladies' match was very interesting, but the day was spoiled by two contretemps. The judges said there were ties, and awarded the prize to two, which ended in D.'s having to duplicate the locket he had chosen. Then, at the very last moment, the gentlemen found fault with some arrangement, and refused to skate, so one walked over the course by himself!

The little girls' skating was beautiful.

When the matches were over, there was dancing till eleven o'clock.

CHAPTER VI.

OUR FIRST PARLIAMENTARY SESSION.

Ottawa : Friday, February 14th.—The curling-rink, outside our windows, was ready to-day, and the gentlemen had a game in the morning and skated in the afternoon. We played “puss in the corner” and “friar’s ground” on skates with the children, who were delighted with this idea—mine, I beg to say.

Saturday, 15th.—Curling and skating are our exercises every day. We have had a great consultation over our arrangements for the “season.” During Lent there can be no balls, but we shall have some plays. Two pieces, “The First Night” and “To Oblige Benson,” are already in hand, and we are to have one play each week, and each play twice. This will give us four entertainments. After Easter we shall give a big ball in the new room.

For the opening of Parliament we have invited Mr. and Mrs. Howland, with whom we stayed in Toronto, to come to us. The meeting is on the 5th, and we have a Cabinet dinner the night before, a dinner the day after, an ice-party on Friday, and a small dinner on Saturday.

I suppose the House will “sit” all through April, so that we can ask the 280 members to dinner before they leave Ottawa.

The children’s dreadful colds are all better, but the doctor tells me he has had over 200 cases of the same. At one o'clock in the night the thermometer was 20° below zero, and at one in the day 50° above—a difference of seventy degrees—so it is not extraordinary that people catch colds!

D. continues to feel quite warm and comfortable, and not to wear a fur coat: his turn will come in the summer, when he will begin to wrap up.

Monday, 17th.—Fred, Nelly and I took a drive this morning, as the day was so splendid, and as I had to remain at home in the afternoon. I received 133 visitors, and if the weather has ears, they must have been extremely hot when we had finished discussing it on every side.

The curling, which we have set up in a covered rink close to our skating place, seems to be very successful, and D. and Fred play a great deal.

The "Witness" publishes an account of "Hamilton Rowan," mentioning me as his granddaughter, which, they are pleased to say, "accounts for the good drop in me." This is the paper which came to ask Fred for details of our engagements at Montreal, and said, "Oh! we will miss the ball, if you please; we are a religious paper."

Wednesday, 29th.—Such a thaw to-day; our ice was all under water, and we are quite afraid the winter is going. We shall have a very mauvais quart d'heure between this and summer—a time when skating is impossible, and walking and driving nearly so, everything dripping around us.

Some of Lady Harriet's "imported" servants are beginning to marry; happily, mine are still fancy free.

Saturday, 22d.—The actors in "To Oblige Benson" arrived at twelve this morning to rehearse the piece. They none of them knew it in the least. "They" are Fred and Mr. Coulson, Colonel and Mrs. Stuart, and a nice-looking Miss Himsworth. After lunch the rest of the world arrived to skate. It was a lovely afternoon, and they practiced the lancers, while I looked on at the tobogganing, and just missed seeing a disagreeable sight. Little Edward Fletcher was standing dreaming in the middle of the hill, and as a toboggan was coming fast down upon him the people on the top shouted to him to get out of the way; but he did not hear, and the toboggan, with a young lady in it, lifted him right up in the air. She got her eye cut, and had a bump on her forehead. It might have been a bad accident.

After the outdoor party we had a dance to warm ourselves, and all went home at 6.30.

Sir John and Lady Macdonald, and M. Langevin, arrived, to stay till Monday. Sir John is the Prime Minister, and M. Langevin the Public Works, who has built our ball-room and does all our improvements.

Monday, March 3d.—To-morrow the Session, with its duties, commences.

Tuesday, 4th.—As the dancing is over for the present, I have been busy all morning refurnishing my big drawing-room, which has hitherto been kept as a ball-room. The new room is nearly ready, and is very handsome. It is to be opened as a theatre, and we are having such a pretty stage put up. Lady Harriet Fletcher has come over to spend a few days, for a change, and to help me to entertain Mrs. Howland.

We had our Cabinet dinner; all men, except Lady Harriet and me, the two ladies of the house. I sat between the Prime Minister, Sir John, and the Postmaster-General, Mr. Campbell. They were both very pleasant neighbors. All were in uniform, and all full of animation and ready for the fray.

Wednesday, 5th.—In the afternoon, D. dressed in uniform, and drove in a sleigh-and-four, escorted by troops, A. D. C.s, and secretaries, to direct his faithful Lords and Commons to choose a Speaker. This did not take very long, and on his return we went and sat at the Rink in delicious sunshine for a couple of hours.

Thursday, 6th.—The opening of Parliament. Having to dress in the middle of the day, I was lazy, and did not appear at all till I was arrayed in my finery. His Ex. wore the Governor's uniform, like that of the Queen's Household: collar of St. Patrick, and cocked hat kept on all the time. Mrs. Howland and I, Mr. Pattisson and Mr. Curtis, went in the first carriage, Miss Blake and three children in the next. We arrived some time before the Governor-General, and I was conducted to my seat by the Gentleman-Usher of the Black Rod. The Chamber looked very well. I sat to the left of the throne, and down each side of the Senate were rows of ladies in full dress; the Senators were on the floor of the House, and the galleries were full to the ceiling. D. drove in an open sleigh with four horses, accompanied by Mr. Howland and Colonel Fletcher. Mr. Holbeach followed with Fred. As they came up to the building twenty-one guns were fired. The Black Rod met the procession and walked backwards, bowing all the way, His Excellency getting more stern-looking every minute. When the procession arrived at the Senate-Chamber, we all stood up, and waited until the Governor-General, having taken his seat on the throne, requested us to be seated.

The Commons were sent for, and we sat in solemn silence till they came. D. then read his speech, first in English, and then all over again in French; and everything that was said was repeated in the two languages. Then Colonel Fletcher carried the speeches to the Speakers of both Houses, and so the ceremony ended, and we went away as we came. The children were much interested, but remarked upon Papa's gravity; they thought it a proper occasion to be wreathed in smiles.

Saturday, 8th.—We had rather a pleasant dinner-party of Ministers. Mr. and Mrs. Howland seemed very happy, and she looked very smart in blue velvet. The Speaker of the Senate came to stay with us.

Monday, 10th.—The frost seemed to have returned, so we sent out our invitations for a skating-party for this afternoon. The day was, however, too lovely, and the ice, which had been in splendid order, got quite soft. It is possible to be happy on doubtful ice here, as we know there is no water under it, and that it is only snow sprinkled. The skaters kept in one shady corner, and I and my guests sat on the brink, and were quite warm and comfortable.

We had another dinner-party—our farewell entertainment to the Howlands.

Tuesday, 11th.—Mr. and Mrs. Howland left this morning in a snowstorm, and we remained in the house all day. Great arrangements and discussions go on about the coming Drawing-room: Who is to have the entrée? Who is to have seats? Which way are these people to come in, and which way those? Where is Her Excellency's cloak to be taken off? etc., etc. Then I,—not being very well, and having meekly asked to have a tall office-stool behind me, against which I might occasionally lean,—an architect and several carpenters have been busily engaged in making a design—ground-plan and elevation—of a complicated and splendid erection, crowned by a vase of flowers, and covered with crimson, which is to appear as a part of the throne, but which is to be scooped out for me to sit on; and a request for my exact height has been forwarded to me, that all may be correct. This ceremony will be in the Senate-Chamber, and both Houses of Parliament have adjourned for the occasion.

We also had a discussion as to whether we could put off our theatricals on Thursday, for Mario and Carlotta Patti, who were to have given a concert to-day, have been snowbound, and can not get here until that day; and as 200 of the principal people here are coming to us, both the singers and the public lose a good deal. Pepper's Ghost is also tearing its hair at the number of gayeties in Ottawa, and wrote an entertaining appeal to D. to come himself on Friday, so we could not take the Ghost's day; after much consideration we keep Thursday, but try to get Mario and C. Patti to sing a song here after our play; it will be very nice if they can do so. The arrangement of our political dinners also requires some thought. We have to study which party the proposed guests belong to: which province, whether French or English—Upper or Lower Canada, their social position, etc., etc., so that the dinners may be made as pleasant as possible to the guests.

Wednesday, 12th.—Still too fine and warm, and ice bad. We are sorry, as this evening two very good skaters come to stay with us, one from Quebec and one from Montreal.

We dressed in our best for the Drawing-room, and got to the Parliament Buildings at nine. In spite of all the grand arrangements we got out at the wrong door, but everything else went off very well. The Ministers went in with us, and we stood by the throne—I with my support behind me—their wives followed, then Senators, and then the World.

Thursday, 13th.—We had a great party to-night, and opened our new room. The guests assembled at nine, and after having some tea were conducted through unknown passages to their future ball-room, where they found 300 chairs arranged in rows, in front of a very pretty little stage, and a band dressed in the gorgeous uniform of the Governor-General's Guards. The entertainment began with music, and was followed by "To Oblige Benson," which went off admirably. People were particularly delighted with Fred's performance—he did the part of Trotter Southdown; and Mrs. Southdown was excellent, too.

Just as they finished, Mario and M. Saury, a violin-player, arrived. They came as guests, and would hear of no terms. After a little, D. asked Mario to sing, and the audience were greatly delighted at his doing so twice. The violin-player was also a great treat. It was wonderfully kind of both gentlemen to perform for us, as they only arrived at Ottawa at five in the afternoon, and came direct from a concert. This delightful music made our party a great success. We went straight into supper afterward, and it took some time to feed and "speed" the parting 300.

Friday, 14th.—I kept this as a day of rest, and in the evening dispatched my young party, under Lady Harriet's chaperonage, to see "Pepper's Ghost." She does not seem to have been a good duenna, for she said "good night" to the young men and maidens directly they were seated, and slept composedly through the whole lecture.

Saturday, 15th.—It began to pour with rain this afternoon, and the roads were very bad for our dinner-party. We had one of thirty people—the first of a long series of similar dinners to be given every Saturday for three months. The guests were culled from all parts of Canada; we had representatives from the shores of the Atlantic, the Pacific, the St. Lawrence, Lake Huron; Upper and Lower Canadians, French, English and Scotch,

"Grits" (the Opposition) and Conservatives (the Government).

The night turned out very bad; it blew fearfully, and has blown in a very large window in our new room.

Monday, 17th.--Another young lady, a Miss Macpherson from Toronto, came to stay with us, so now we have representatives of the three great towns in our house.

Wednesday, 19th.--We were out all the morning; but the ice is soft and the snow wet.

Two tourists came to skate, in wonderful costumes: striped red-and-yellow stockings, moccasins, bright blue blanket-coats, with embroidered shoulder-pieces, and Albanian scarfs round their waists. We asked them to dine with us before the play.

People were quite surprised and delighted with "The First Night." The old actor was most splendidly done by M. Kimber, and the singing introduced before and during the piece was excellent.

Friday, 28th.--I took a drive in the afternoon, and at four went to the Houses of Parliament to pay my first visit there. I have a seat on the floor of the House, next to the Speaker's. The business was not very interesting, but I was rather amused, as a number of people made very short speeches, and one saw their "tricks and their manners."

Saturday, 29th.--In the evening we had a large Parliamentary dinner. One of my near neighbors was very interesting. He is a "working-man" member; we had met him soon after his election, when he dined in a rough coat, but now he wears evening clothes; he talked so pleasantly, and was full of information. One of our guests, a French Canadian, made great efforts to reach the nursery when he heard the children romping upstairs, and told me he was most curious to see "le lord." I think he imagined Archie* must be very peculiar.

Wednesday, April 2d.—We drove into Ottawa on wheels. D. goes in every week to have tête-à-tête interviews with different Members of Parliament. This evening there was a vote of want of confidence in the Government, but the Ministers won by thirty-three.

We had "Benson" for the last time; very well done, and much appreciated. The children helped to warm up the audience by their shrieks of delight.

Friday, 4th.—Two men dined with us: one, the Speaker of the Legislature in Manitoba, who has lately been tarred-and-feathered by the people, and who came to relate his experiences of that operation. The other, a Mr. Otley—a nephew of Sir Hastings Doyle's, who has been engineering near the Rocky Mountains—has walked hundreds of miles on snow-shoes, lived for months on salt pork, been eaten by mosquitoes in summer, and slept and lived, unprepared for winter, in an atmosphere 40° below zero. He came out with us in the Prussian.

Tuesday, 8th.—I went to the House, as a scrimmage was expected. First, there was great excitement over the Easter holidays—what length they should be—and then a party motion about which there was a great deal of interest. The Opposition had asked for a Committee to inquire into the conduct of members of the Government, accusing them of bribery. They lost, and then the Government itself asked for the same Committee, saying they courted inquiry. There was a good deal of irritation about the whole affair.

Tuesday, 15th.—The two Miss Bethunes arrived yesterday to stay a week with us, and we opened our new ball-room this evening. It is a fine room, very lofty and well-proportioned. It has not yet been painted, so we decorated it with white-and-blue twists of tarlatan and bunches of pink roses. These encircled all the windows and doors, and appeared to be twisted round the flat pillars against the wall and across the corners. The crimson throne was at one end of the room, and there was a place for the band at the other. The ante-room, hall, billiard- and tea-rooms, the passage leading up to my boudoir, and the conservatory, looked very pretty, the latter being lighted with Chinese lanterns. The large drawing-room and dining-room were both arranged for supper, and seated 140 at a time. Some 650 people were present, and, they say, all were pleased.

Thursday, May 1st.—This week we have had lovely weather. The sun is quite hot, and I am out all day. We have put up a tent on the lawn, and every afternoon the family play football, marbles, prisoner's base, and other games, to the great delight of all.

We find Parliament is likely to sit another ten days, so we have given up all idea of moving to Quebec at present. We are rather afraid of the heat and the mosquitoes here, but it can not be helped.

Friday, 2d.—Encouraged by the lovely weather, I put a notice in the paper that I should be "at home" to-day, intending to receive people in the garden, have tea and a band there, and at five to let those who liked dance in the ball-room. The morning was, however, cold and miserable, and the afternoon poured with rain; so I had to sit in the drawing-room. About fifty people came, and they danced indoors all the time, and were apparently quite happy. Nine children took part in the amusements, the little ones liking the band, and getting quite at home with the strangers.

Saturday, 3d.—The provoking weather was fine again to-day, and I am under my tent once more. Mr. and Mrs. Ryan and her daughter arrived from Montreal to stay Sunday with us. Mr. Ryan is a very pleasant Irish Senator, his wife a very nice Swiss-French lady, for whom he waited forty years, she marrying some one else in the meantime.

Thursday, 8th.—I saw Lady Macdonald on Tuesday, the day that Sir John made his splendid speech in the House, with which Fred was so greatly delighted.

Friday, 9th.—I advertised that I should be “at home between three and six” this afternoon. Part of the entertainment was to be out of doors, and part in. The weather was very doubtful all the morning; but we took courage, had the tea laid on the lawn, put up a tent and down a carpet, turned the drawing-room chairs out into the garden, and at three were rewarded by the commencement of a really fine afternoon.

I received in the tent, and the company sat and walked about listening to the Guards’ band till after four, when they went into the ball-room and danced very vigorously for the rest of the time; but I stayed in the garden and watched the dancers come out to the tea, and talked to a few of the old people, though most of them danced, too.

Saturday, 10th.—Mr. Coulson left us to-day. We were sorry to lose him, and, I think, he was sorry to go. He joins his regiment (60th Rifles) at Halifax.

We had our last Parliamentary dinner for this Session. The Prime Minister of Prince Edward’s Island and some colleagues of his, who are here to try and arrange about joining the Confederation, dined.

Wednesday, 14th.—Fred went to dine in Ottawa, Lady Harriet was having tea with me, and D., the Colonel, and the Doctor were looking for fossils, when, to my great surprise, Lord George Campbell was announced—the Duke of Argyll's sailor son. We sent to the hotel for his things.

Thursday, 15th.—Fred took our guest a ride, and in the afternoon they went with Lady Harriet and Miss Blake to the House. We had a dinner-party, which was arranged for a young lady who is going to marry an Englishman, and who wanted to dine here before she went home. We asked two other girls, and put the smart young man between them! Oddly enough, an old shipmate of his, whom he had not seen for four years, was also at dinner.

Prince Edward's Island has come into the Confederation, so the Governor-General's dominion is enlarged; but he loses one of his titles.

Saturday, 17th.—A little girl was born this day, and the Queen has telegraphed that she will be her godmother.

CHAPTER VII.

ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Tuesday, June 10th.—We left Ottawa this morning very early, going by rail to Prescott, with our whole family, the new baby included. There we got into a steamer, and sat all day on deck. We had a delightful cruise down the river, and an exciting descent of the Rapids. In one place we passed within a few inches of a wreck, and we felt quite creepy. At Montreal we changed steamers. The children were delighted with the grandeur of the St. Lawrence boats, with their enormous saloons and state-cabins. When we were at tea we heard some music—the “Dead March”—being played; and looking out, we saw, passing slowly in the darkness, the steamer with the body of Sir George Cartier* on board; it was a striking moment—the chapel on board lighted up, the band playing, and bells tolling at sea, answered by bells tolling on shore.

Wednesday, 11th.—We awoke at Quebec, and found it wet and cold. In spite of the weather and the early hour, we had a friendly welcome from the people.

Monday, 16th.—The little baby’s christening-day!

A large bouquet had been sent me in the morning,

* Sir George Cartier, late member for Montreal East, had died in England. He was a descendant of the famous Jacques Cartier who, in 1534, took possession of Canada in the name of Francis I, King of France.

and beautiful flowers for the font, by Mr. Levi. The Cathedral was full of people; I had my whole six children there, and they made a very good show. Lady "Victoria Alexandrina Muriel May" behaved admirably, and slept soundly the whole time, in spite of a deluge of Jordan water.

Then we registered her baptism very fully:—Myself as "Proxy for Her Majesty the Queen"; Lady H. Fletcher, "godmother"; Sir John A. Macdonald, "god-father"; Fred and a Minister, Mr. Campbell—as present.

Basil was, I am told, on the verge of being naughty, and won all the ladies' hearts by his wicked efforts to climb over the pew, and to knock down all the prayer-books.

We came home and rested a little, and at four I was "at home." The company, D., and the Fletchers went out on the platform and enjoyed themselves listening to the band, but Fred and I were kept hard at work announcing and receiving people; we could not stir for an instant, a continuous stream coming in, and he was doubtless much tantalized as the young ladies passed him, and left him, like a sentry, tied to the door-post. I tried to drink a cup of tea, but had it nearly shaken over my dress by twenty hands, as I said "How do you do?" and gave it up in despair. However, the A. D. C. and I did our duty,—and outside every one was well entertained, and the affair went off well. We had a family dinner, and all, upstairs and down, drank baby's health.

Tuesday, 17th.—A long day of Viceregal functions. At twelve we ate a hasty lunch and started, with five children and our "suite," to the Ursuline Convent, where I was to give away the prizes.

There is a new Lieutenant-Governor here, and as he has a large family, our combined movements on State occasions require a deal of arrangement. The first fact established is, that the Governor-General and I, on public occasions, walk first; His Honor, the Lieutenant-Governor and his wife follow. But the five Lieutenant-Princesses have also to be seated in proper positions, and when (as to-day) I take three of my family the A. D. C.s tear their hair! Priests met us at the convent door, and we proceeded to the room where the prizes were to be given, which was filled with people. The nuns did not appear at all. I found in front of me trays full of books, and as the names of the winners were read out, with an account of their various merits, they walked past, and I presented them with books. There were at least 200 prizes, every girl in the school, I am sure, having gained from one to six "rewards of merit." Then I crowned six of the most remarkably virtuous young ladies. The first three wreaths, alas! I put on wrong side foremost, but perceiving that the girls managed to turn them round, I was more careful, and was at the end complimented upon the way in which I placed them on their heads. Between each trayful of books we had music. The ceremony lasted two hours. One lady fainted, but the children bore it admirably, and I took them to a field of cut grass to refresh them when it was over.

We dined at six, for we had to go out early to celebrate the 200th anniversary of the discovery of the Mississippi. "Why on earth?" you will exclaim. Well, I don't quite know why, but the Laval University has to find some object for a yearly fête, and the discoverers were French-Canadians.

The celebration was a tremendous affair. For three hours I sat on a very hard and stately arm-chair, with my Lieutenant-Governor beside me, on my right an empty space, on the other side of which sat His Ex. and his Lieutenant-Governess.

Friday, 20th.—We christened a large new ship this morning—the Earl of Dufferin. The day seemed fine, but heavy showers came on. The ship is on the stocks at present, and I had great difficulty in breaking the bottle, as the rope was badly hung, and when I aimed at the narrow bow it would swing away. At the third effort, however, I succeeded.

In the evening we attended a concert given in aid of the widow of a poor gunner who was killed by the bursting of a gun the day before we arrived here.

Saturday, 21st.—We drove down to our new yacht. The Government has fitted up a vessel for us—the Druid. Most charming cabins are arranged for me, and everything is perfect for yachting—but I have to combine sailor clothes with garments enough for two months of Viceregal ceremonies, which would be difficult even on the Great Eastern. I fear Dent will go mad with the agony of crushing my things into “bunkers.” My cabin has a comfortable bed, a hanging-press, and a large glass, ornamented with pink ribbon and muslin. D. has an excellent cabin off it, and Dent another. The dining-room is paneled with chintz and light wood, and Fred sleeps on one of the sofas there. We have a nice after-cabin for a drawing-room, and Lady Harriet and the Colonel have small rooms off it. To-night baby sleeps on board with her two nurses, and we sail for Tadousac.

Sunday, 22d.—After breakfast we went to our new house at Tadousac. It is so pretty, with red roof, green blinds, and white walls. We have a platform, upon which we sit and look out upon the St. Lawrence, and on to which all the sitting-rooms open. The children will, I think, be very happy and comfortable here until our return, for we do not remain here now.

The clergyman has not yet arrived, so there was no service. We sat on the sands and paddled a little in D.'s Rice Lake canoe—the Lady May. Then we returned to our ship to dine and sleep.

Monday, 23d.—Such a stormy morning: Dent, my precious maid, wild about her boxes, and giving warning on the spot; myself in despair, for she is a treasure. On shore another valuable member of our household also in a tantrum about something, and when I land I must encounter her. Dent will, I trust, calm down, for I really can't bear the idea of losing her.

An address was presented to His Ex. by the Tadousacians on the occasion of his becoming a householder here.

We gave a house-warming, and had the Curé, and the Squire's agent and his daughter, and our captain to dinner. We sat on our balcony till nine o'clock, and then came on board.

Tuesday, 24th.—We started in a boat directly after breakfast to see the salmon-fishery, and saw ten fish caught in a labyrinth.

Wednesday, 25th.—The anniversary of our arrival in Canada. We left Tadousac during the night, and had a most lovely day on board, sitting out reading; the weather perfect. We reached the mouth of the Godbout in the afternoon, and the owners, or, rather, the hirers, of that river came on board to bring us two salmon, and to make plans for to-morrow. They are Mr. Gilmour, Mr. Cross, and Mr. Muir.

Thursday, 26th.—We got up before six o'clock, and started for the shore. In the night the wind had risen a little, and we were in the happy position of being anchored in a swell. However, we got safely to the river, which was quite smooth, and the weather beautifully warm. We breakfasted at the wooden huts, and fished all day. It was almost too fine for the salmon; they jumped and frisked about under our noses, and would not rise, so that after many hours' hard work there were only three fish to show. Fred caught one his very first throw, but did no more after this hopeful beginning. The Colonel retired to bed on his return to the ship; but the swell is better!

Friday, 27th.—D. and Colonel Fletcher went off early in the morning to fish, and Lady Harriet and I met them in the afternoon. They had had very little sport, but D. had some fun with one salmon: in pursuing it he fell into the water, but held on to his fish and landed it; he had to array himself in Mr. Gilmour's clothes, and when we returned to our ship we found such a gale blowing that it was impossible to send the boat back again, so D. had to carry off his borrowed plumes.

We bought two little beavers from the Indians, to keep as pets on board. The crew were greatly interested in them, and we have established them in a barrel on deck, and amuse ourselves with giving them baths and feeding them.

A rough-looking evening; we are to start during the night.

The Mingan, Sunday, 29th.—Found ourselves in a splendid harbor this morning, where we shall never feel the slightest movement; on one side is an island, and on the other we see a little settlement of Indian wigwams, their nicely-built chapel, and some houses belonging to the "Honorable Company" (the Hudson's Bay). We had service in the cabin, and after lunch went ashore.

A priest visits these out-of-the-way stations once a year, and he happens to be here now. The Indians are very obedient to him, and are religious in their way. It was very picturesque to see them troop to church, the women dressed in gaudy colors, with cloth caps of red and black on their heads (something the shape of sailors' red, pointed nightcaps), their babies and children with them. We followed them into the chapel, and found all the squaws squatting on one side, and the men on the other. They sang a Canticle—the women one verse, the men the next; the music was a melancholy wail, with very few notes, and the voices of the singers were thin and weak, but it was interesting and curious. I should like to have stayed till the end, but the Chief began to get us chairs, and to bring us into notice, so we left.

We walked across the little peninsula on which the chapel is, got into our canoes on the river Mingan, and paddled up to look at the fishing ground. It is at the foot of a very pretty waterfall.

The Priest and the Captain dined with us. The former is a pleasant man. He is just going up to the Esquimaux. He is very ill at sea, and has before him a voyage in a small schooner which may last three weeks. These missionary priests have hard lives. We were told that on Saturday he had scarcely had anything to eat, the Indians having nothing to give him. The huts here are made of poles very lightly covered with birch-bark; in each of these tents seven or eight families live.

The priest in his yearly visits to these Indians arranges all of a suitable age in couples, and marries them; and there is a total absence of all love-making. They are very moral: drink (when they can get it) and laziness being their sins. Those we have seen here are hideous.

There is a great meeting at a place called Bersimis once a year, and all the Indians, that can, go there; the greater part of the marriages take place then. The Chief had on a black frock-coat ornamented with epau-llets. He called D. "Brother." The same man received one of our Princes when they came here, and saluted him in the same way, then showed him a medal he wore on his breast, and said, "Ta mère; tu connais?"

Monday, 30th—We got up at six, and went in our canoes up the Mingan. It is about an hour's paddle. The three rods fished away, and D. caught two salmon, one a twenty-pound fish; this was all the success before eleven o'clock, though there were about ten rises. It became very hot at this time, and we went into our tents to wait for the cool of the day. The gentlemen bathed, and in getting into the canoe to go to the bathing-place were upset, and wet all their clothes.

We were just going to begin fishing again, when an Indian canoe arrived bringing us very sad news. One of our footmen had gone out fishing and was drowned. We returned immediately. We saw the place where the accident happened; on the rocks lay a piece of bread he had been eating. He had got up and stood at the edge of the water with his rod. The steward said, "Can you swim?" "No." "Then take care, for it is slippery, and the water is very deep." "Never fear," he said, and instantly slipped. He put up his hands to take off a mosquito-veil he had on, and disappeared. The steward dived after him, but he never rose at all. A boat was got, and presently the men saw the thick end of a fishing-rod sticking up. They took hold of it, and lifted the poor dead body up with it. He appeared to be upright in the water, the rod fast in his hand.

The Hudson's Bay Company overseer has arranged everything, and the funeral will be to-morrow.

Tuesday, July 1st.—The priest gave us a place in the churchyard here, and at two o'clock to-day the funeral took place; the flags were half-mast high, and every possible mark of mourning and respect was shown. All the crew attended, and the sailors carried the body to the grave. D. read the service.

Wednesday, 2d.—At three o'clock to-day we started to go up the river.

The fishermen are not very fortunate; the salmon are not rising, and the greater part of those that have been landed have been hooked by the tail or in the back. Fred caught five; one weighed $23\frac{1}{2}$ lbs., and it was taken in a curious way: the hook never touched it, but it was caught in a noose round the tail. Colonel Fletcher got two, but D. was very unlucky.

The morning was extremely foggy, but the afternoon was fine, and we dined out on the rocks, and came on board to a late tea.

Thursday, 3d.—The fishermen again left in the afternoon and went to sleep up at the Waterfall. The night was wet, and there was thunder and lightning.

Friday, 4th.—Lady Harriet and I went up the river after lunch with the Captain, who is to have some fishing. The salmon will not rise, and it was in vain that everybody tried every dodge to entice them; they will not be caught. We dined on the rocks, and left our gentlemen in their tents for another day, coming back again with the Captain, who was, I fear, much disappointed with his want of success. We reached the ship in such a fog!

Saturday, 5th.—We spent a quiet day on board, and only went ashore for half an hour, to visit Mrs. Scott, the wife of the Hudson's Bay Agent. She is a French-Canadian, and must live a lonely life here. We also went to look at the grave of our poor man. The gentlemen returned in the evening, and we had another wet night. They had had very bad sport. It turns out that the foot of a waterfall is an impossible place to fish in. The salmon do not rise at all, but a great many get foul-hooked; this accounts for our ill-success.

Sunday, 6th.—We had intended leaving the Mingan to-day, but it is too stormy. We had prayers on board, and then went for a walk on the island, and looked for fossils, and saw a live seal, a flock of wild duck, and three tame goats.

Monday, 7th.—After breakfast we fished for trout. I caught six good ones, and was the only lucky person; the others got some tiny creatures. We returned to our ship at three o'clock, and instantly got under way. The afternoon was lovely, and we spent it in that kind of busy idleness which distinguishes life on board ship. 3.30: Rumor that a seal is seen; rush to the side—get out rifles, opera-glasses, telescopes—fire—splash; all right! nobody hurt; seal looks up again. 3.50: Number of sea-birds to starboard; fire again. 4.15: A whale! he appears, disappears, turns up again for nearly an hour. 5 o'clock: An island! 5.10: On the island thousands of sea-gulls sitting on their eggs. 5.20: Fire at the island, tremendous excitement among the gulls, and instant flight of the whole colony. 5.30: Attend to the tame partridge; fetch water for her, catch flies for her. 5.50: Attend to the beavers; they refuse to come and be looked at; are they ill? Oh, the poor pets! “Turn their box upside down”—no, they won't come out. “Shake them,” “put in your hand,” etc., etc. “Anti-costi in sight”; every one rushes to look at it. A long, low strip of land, where we are glad to see there is nothing to be seen, as many people wanted us to stay there. 6.30: Dinner. 6.50: A shower. 7.30: A beautiful sunset. 7.40: Waves getting up, passengers getting less and less frisky. 8.15: Assured that in five hours it will be calm. 8.30: Colonel Fletcher says “good night.” 9: Tea comes—ladies won't attempt it. 9.10: Lady Harriet disappears. 9.30: All in bed, and, I am happy to add, asleep and well.

Tuesday, 8th.—A new page in our Canadian history

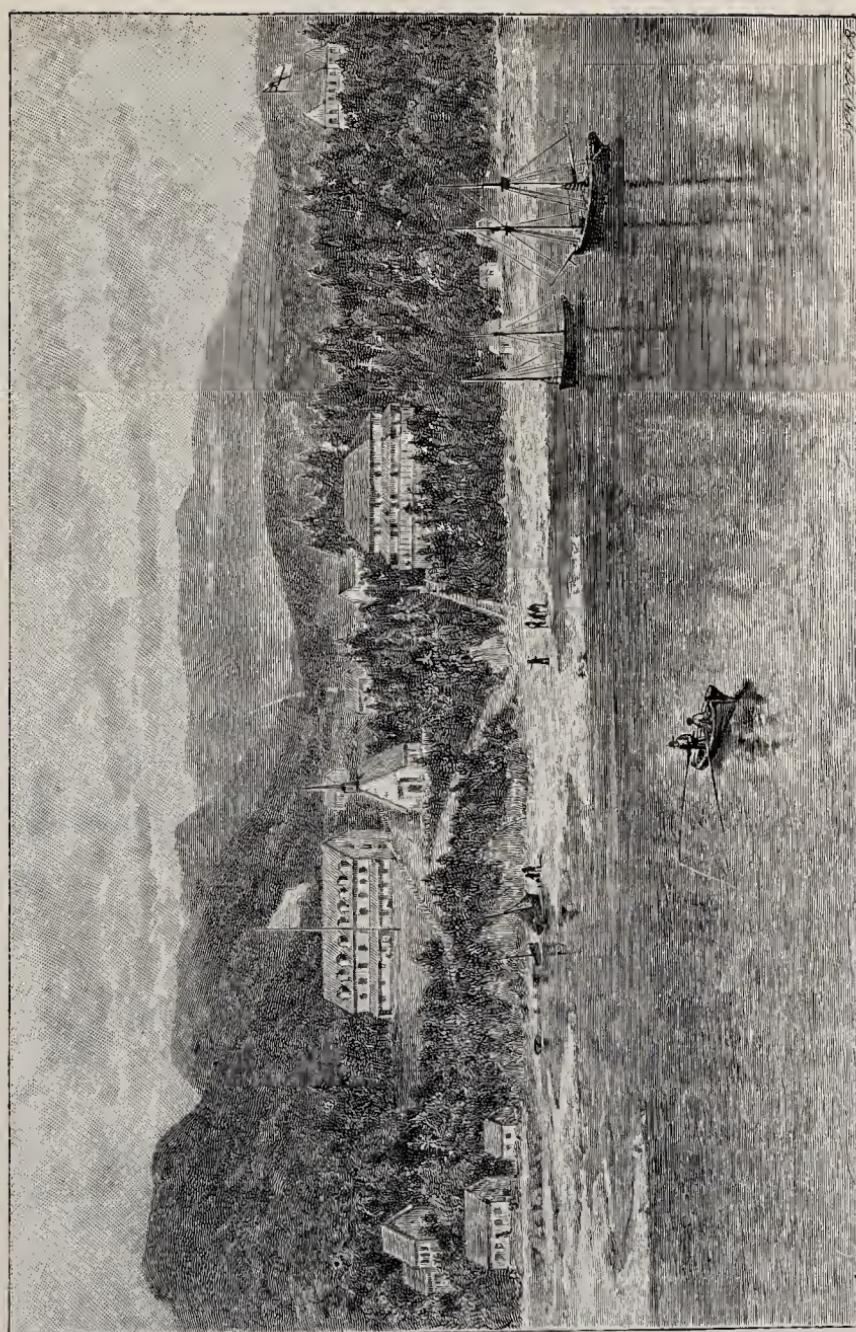

—Gaspé. This morning I came on deck, and found that we were steaming up a lovely lough into a splendid harbor. A sunny landscape: hills, and white houses, and red roofs dotted about; sufficient houses to make it very gay, and not enough to make a town of it. "Such a place for a sailing-boat," D. thinks, and is delighted with it.

A gentleman comes on board, and we make arrangements for the morrow. We get our mail, and write our letters.

In the afternoon a deputation appears, and reads an address, to which His Ex. replies in "suitable terms." The deputation consists of the Mayor, the Custom House Officers, the Doctor, and other local dignitaries. They ask if we will have a drive, and promise to have carriages ready for us when we like. So at four o'clock we go ashore. On the landing-place we are met by our friends, and I find that Gaspé driving is all to be done tête-à-tête. The Mayor takes His Ex. in a gig, I follow with a millowner in the next. Number Three contains the Colonel and Mr. Eden (of whom more hereafter); Number Four, Lady Harriet and the Doctor; Fred closes the procession with—I don't know who; but he must have been the fifth in order of precedence at Gaspé. It was amusing, starting off in this way, and we took a pretty drive for nearly two hours, and made ourselves as agreeable as possible to our several companions. It was rather fun, in the evening, comparing notes as to the various items of news, and the different opinions we had gleaned from our drivers. One considered Gaspé the rising place in the universe, another viewed it gloomily, etc.

Mr. Kidd and Mr. Campbell (belonging to the Governor-General's office) dined with us, and we saw some fireworks and a bonfire in our honor on shore.

Wednesday, 9th.—A very great day. Up at six, and go ashore; tents and baggage are packed into canoes and go down the bay, while we drive to meet them. We are in our gigs again; but ours is a double one, and we are driven by the Mr. Eden of whom I spoke before. He is the “oldest inhabitant,” a Custom House officer, and a most sanguine person. He assures us we shall catch fifty salmon, and views everything in the couleur de rosiest light. We do have a most lovely drive. The country is like the Highlands, and we see wild hills on one side, and Gaspé Bay on the other. The road is through trees, and it would be impossible anywhere to see a more beautiful country. The day is very fine, we drive very fast, and it is most pleasant. In an hour and a half we meet the canoes on the Dartmouth River, and we become most picturesque! Imagine six birch-bark canoes in procession; in each two men stand upright, with long poles in their hands, while two passengers sit in the center of the boat. We have three hours' journey in this way up a beautiful river, going up rapids and enjoying ourselves. Then we arrive at a salmon-pool, get out, and pitch our tents. We have two bell-tents, a small one for Fred, and a tent for the cook. The twelve canoe-men make one of birch-bark for themselves. We hoist our flag and take possession. Our chef is capital; he works away, builds himself a fireplace; gets out his pots and pans, and soon sets before us a splendid dinner. We have soup and fish, and entrées and pudding, and are far from “roughing it.” We have but two trials in life—one is great, the other small—1st, the terrible flies; and 2d, the obstinacy of the salmon, who do not rise. The gentlemen whip the pools and catch nothing, and we ladies find a few trout; then we have tea, and retire to our tents. We have a little trouble in them at first. Mosquito-curtains have been put up, but as I endeavor to crawl under them the whole erection tumbles down, and it is some time before I am safe inside.

OUR HOUSE AND THE HOTEL, TADOUSAC.

Thursday, 10th.—We are all up early, and breakfast at five, get into our canoes, and proceed higher up the river. The pools we reach to-day are very lovely, and we have a very pleasant day at them. I catch a number of trout, so do Fred and Lady Harriet; and Fred got a salmon—the only one. We stopped fishing at eleven; the men made a bower of branches and birch-bark, and we sat and read and ate until four, when we fished again. The last pool was so pretty—or, rather, fine. There were great cliffs on either side, and in front a waterfall with a wall of rock and trees behind it, the further course of the river being quite hidden from view. At eight o'clock we left, and paddled down to our camp, passing through some great rapids. The worst are called the “Lady’s Steps.” Tea and bed followed.

Friday, 11th.—Again we breakfast at five, and begin our return journey in exactly the same way as we came. Finding an invitation from an American gentleman to go up his river, the St. John, and to stay with him, we accept; so we go on board the Druid, wash and dress better than is possible in a tent, and in two hours begin a new adventure.

We drive for half an hour, cross a stream in a boat, walk a little way, and then meet six saddle-horses. These we mount, and ride for three hours through the forest; five miles of the way being through a burned wood. The tall, charred trunks are all that remain of the old forest, but a beautiful fresh underwood has grown up everywhere. This ride brings us to Mr. Curtis’s “shanty” on the St. John.

I could not get on with him at first, but I soon found that he was very nice, and that it was only preoccupation that was the matter with him—and no wonder, for it seems that we ought to have brought blankets with us, and the poor man is in despair, as he, of course, has a very limited supply in the backwoods. We swear that we like doing without blankets, and he is happy. There was time for a little fishing, and Fred caught a salmon. Lady Harriet and I sleep in a tent; D., the Colonel, and Fred, side by side in the house. Off their bedroom is a dining-room, partly covered in with mosquito-curtains, under which we dine.

The sand-flies are dreadful here, but we try to defy them with smoky fires (called "smudges") and curtains. After dinner we sit out of doors before a pile of blazing wood.

You remember that I told you that a poor man-servant of ours was drowned at the Mingan. As we knew nothing about his people, we were unable to communicate the news of his death to them, so D. ordered any letters that might arrive for him to be brought to himself. The first of these—which we have just received—was from a servant-girl he was attached to at Ottawa, and was dated exactly seven days after the day of the accident. In it she said, "I have been in my new place a week, and I like it very much, but I had such a dreadful dream on the day of my arrival. I dreamed that you and Nowell were upset in a boat together, and that Nowell was saved, but you were drowned." As the spot where the accident occurred is in an uninhabited region on the coast of Labrador, more than 500 miles distant from Ottawa, without either telegraphs or posts, it was impossible that she should have had the news of her lover's death when this letter was written.

Saturday, 12th.—After breakfast this morning we got into canoes, and were four hours going up the river; however, we stopped five times on our way to fish, and so the time did not appear long. We only caught trout thus far; but we have reached "Kelly's Pool," and are told that here salmon will surely come. D. catches one (18 lbs.) almost immediately. Mr. Curtis hooks one for me, and hands me the rod, but in so doing off it comes; then he hooks another, I take the rod again, and enjoy myself immensely while I play the fish. I landed him, and great was my joy and pride. Colonel Fletcher and Lady Harriet each play one, but she loses hers. Then we were carried swiftly down the rapids home. Dinner—fireside—bed! Alas! bed is not the end. There was frost to-night, and the limited supply of blankets was terrible. I woke at one, very cold, got up, and dressed in all my clothes, and lay down again; but not to sleep. I shivered till four, and at this early hour on Sunday morning might have been found sitting at a great wood fire out of doors: a tent on my right, where sleeps my friend; behind me a wooden house, where sleep my husband, brother, and the Colonel; to the left a section of a tent, jutting out of which may be seen the feet of sleeping men; one—who is awake—attends to my fire; a dog lies by, the river rolls along in the background. In this picture I may be represented reading a novel; the primeval forest extends itself on every side of me. The rest of the world got up to breakfast at seven, and we rode and drove home to our ship again. Mr. Curtis "of Boston" was most kind to us and very pleasant.

Monday, 14th.—We started in the night, and found ourselves next morning off Percé. The view from our ship is quite lovely. There is the great, precipitous rock standing out by itself, with a natural arch through it, which gives the name to the place; then, on the mainland, the red cliffs rise up above the sea, crowned with green shrubs, and the plateau on which the little town is built slopes down to the water, and ends in another great cliff. The sun shines, and everything is delightful. Colonel Fletcher and D. both made sketches; when they had finished we steamed round the rock, and got into a boat to row ashore.

A salute was fired (by the blacksmith), and all the fishing population of Percé, headed by their Mayor, Manager, and the Sheriff, met us, and of course read an address.

Percé is a most important fishing-station. It is principally owned by Jersey people who have never been to it, and their representative here is Mr. Orange. In addition to its beautiful scenery it has the merit of spotless purity (in spite of a strong smell of fish pervading the atmosphere). The houses and stores are all of the freshest white, with red window-sashes and doors; the streets are of gravel. When His Ex. had replied to the address, we went through the places where the fish is salted, dried, etc.

The operation is as follows: On a table on the beach the cod is beheaded, cut open, and spread flat. He is then brought into a large, square room, laid upon the floor, and salted; above him, below him, and around him, are his fellow-cods. After remaining in this retreat for three or four days, he is put into a great tub and washed. From this he gets into a barrow, and is wheeled out of doors to a long bed of dried fir-boughs, upon which he reposes with his neighbors and gets dried. He ought to lie there for six days, and the Percé fishermen have to watch the clouds all that time, and rush to lift him into a shed should it threaten to rain. A shower would spoil him. From this free-and-easy stage he is removed, and stacked on the gravel, and covered over with birch-bark and heavy stones; this is his final trial, and he is now fit to fulfill the object of his existence, and to be eaten.

The stacks are really works of art—they are so neat and trim. We also inspected the stores and shops of the town. We were told there was a splendid view from the top of a mountain or high cliff above the town, and we started to drive there. I only got to the bottom of the worst climb in the gig with the Mayor and Mayoress, but the gentlemen went to the top. In the afternoon we continued our journey up the Bay of Chaleur to Paspédiac, off which little town we anchored at ten o'clock.

Tuesday, 15th.—D. went ashore at 7 A. M. to look at this place, and found a sleepy Agent, who could not rise to the magnitude of the occasion, or comprehend that it was the Governor-General who represented the “early bird.”

Paspédiac is another part of the Jersey fishing-business. Here ships are built, and in them the dried cod is sent off to its various destinations.

We were detained an hour by our engine, which had got out of order, and so did not reach Dalhousie till five o'clock. The scenery towards the end of the Bay was lovely, and the surroundings of this village reminded us of Scotland. We had not seen such high hills for a long time.

The courageous people of Dalhousie fired off some old guns which had been found at the bottom of the river, and it is a mercy no accident occurred.

The principal inhabitants met us on the wharf, but His Ex's hand was first shaken by a black man, who appears to be a pet jester of the neighborhood. Later, this gentleman perceived he had forgotten me, and made a dive through the crowd to shake hands with me. My gravity was rather upset by this unexpected welcome.

We walked to the Court House, and had an address presented ; then D. took a drive, and I went up to the house of a senator—Mr. Hamilton. We got on board again in time for dinner, and continued our journey in the night.

Wednesday, 16th.—We have had a rough twenty-four hours, and could not enjoy the deck until we were some way up the Miramichi river. The country round here is flat and uninteresting. We reached Chatham in the afternoon, but a sad accident occurred in firing the salute.

An address was read, and lunch prepared at the house of the Member, Mr. Muirhead, to which we had to pass under an arch specially erected in our honor. We returned in the evening to attend a concert given by the convent-school.

Thursday, 17th.—We invited Mr., Mrs., and Miss Muirhead, and two other gentlemen, to breakfast on board, and to go with us to Newcastle, a town a short way from Chatham.

There was an address, and a drive to a new bridge which is being built over the river, and then we set sail—or, rather, “got under steam”—on our way to Prince Edward’s Island, where I hope to receive letters.

CHAPTER VIII.

THE MARITIME PROVINCES.

Friday, July 18th.—This morning we found ourselves in sight of Prince Edward's Island; and very pretty it looked in the sunshine. The cliffs are low, but they show a red line above the water, crowned with green, and the whole country is much more cultivated and more park-like than anything we have as yet seen in Canada.

We anchored at ten, and got some letters from Tadousac, with good accounts of the children; and at twelve we landed at Charlotte Town.

There was a crowd, and a very pretty arch, one of the mottoes on it being “Long courted, won at last,” in allusion to the island having just joined the Dominion.

We are staying at Government House with Mr.* and Mrs. Robinson. They took us a drive through red lanes, farms, trees, and ferns—country sights which are quite delightful to us, who of late have only seen forest scenery.

Saturday, 19th.—We walked through the town, and in the afternoon had a reception, and in the evening a dinner-party.

Monday, 21st.—In the morning we started to take the first trip on the first railway made in the island. About thirty people came with us, and at a distant station we were met by carriages, in which we drove to the sea-shore, where we had lunch. Then we returned home by the same route, and had a little rest before we dressed for a ball at Government House.

Tuesday, 22d.—We drove out with Mr. and Mrs. Robinson to do some shopping, to look at a fine view of the town, and to be photographed under the triumphal arch. Then we went off to the Druid, and H. M. S. Spartan manned yards as we passed. There was a regatta in the harbor, for which D. had given prizes, and we had invited forty people to lunch with us on board and to see the races from our ship. We had a very pleasant afternoon, and as soon as the sports were over we went ashore to give away the prizes. The day was a perfect summer day.

We dined quietly at Government House, and dressed for the ball after dinner. This ball was part of the reception which the local Parliament had resolved to give the Governor-General.

It was in the Parliament Buildings, and the Senate Chamber was beautifully arranged for it. From the ceiling hung a thing like a chandelier, made of roses and moss, which spread out into single ropes of flowers, attached to the gallery all round the room, forming a light canopy of flowers above us; then there were flags and wreaths on the walls; so that nothing could have been prettier. Besides a dressing-room, a little resting-place was provided for me, in which there was a large supply of refreshment!

The supper-room was decorated with green, and with a large painting of D.'s arms, surrounded by all the Canadian flags, that of Newfoundland being still rolled up (it has not joined the Union). The supper was a sort of picnic, being sent by different people, and was very good.

A pretty girl with whom Fred danced said to him: "I noticed that you danced with all the plainest girls and the worst dancers, at Government House on Monday, and I said to myself, 'Well, really, I don't think Mr. Hamilton is such a swell that he need dance with all the plain girls and the bad dancers,'"—alluding, of course, to the Governor-General's partners being chosen for him. Fred immediately asked her for a second waltz. When we left we were accompanied by a torch-light procession to the pier; there we got into our boat, and went on board the Druid. All the ladies, in their ball-dresses, came out on the balcony of the house to see us off; and the arches were illuminated.

Thursday, 24th.—In the morning we reached Pictou.

I must mention here that the climate of Prince Edward's Island was very much more like England than that of our part of Canada, and both Lady Harriet and I felt the change. She got hay-fever and asthma, and is in bed, and I have a cold; however, I did not like to miss seeing the coal-mines of the Dominion, so I went with D. to inspect them. I saw all the above-ground part: the engines, the ventilators, etc. The principal ventilator is called the "Lady Dufferin," and there are two engines which go by the name of the "Lord Dufferin" and the "Lady Victoria." D. went down the mine with Fred and Colonel Fletcher. The shaft was 1,000 feet, and it took them just fifty-four seconds to get to the bottom in a lift. They stayed down there an hour and a half, while I talked to the managers at the top.

We got back to the Druid in time for dinner. All night there was a fearful noise going on—"coaling," just over our heads.

Friday, 25th.—Sailing through the Gut of Canso, with the land close to us on each side, on our way to Louisburg, where we anchor in the morning.

Saturday, 26th.—There is a fog outside the harbor, so we are caught here, but have had a most pleasant day.

I looked in a book of universal knowledge, and read that Louisburg, in addition to its historical interest, is a town with broad streets and stone houses; it is, in reality, a small village, consisting of a few scattered wooden cottages. We landed at one of these, borrowed two gigs, and set off to drive twenty-five miles to the capital of Cape Breton, Sydney by name. D. drove me, and Fred the Colonel; Lady Harriet remained on board.

We drove through pretty woods, occasionally getting a glimpse of one of the several arms of the sea which cut Cape Breton in so many places, sat by the roadside to lunch, and reached Sydney in the afternoon.

It is situated on a beautiful harbor, and we found several large steamers there; the biggest was the Hibernia, which has just been laying the Atlantic cable, in company with the Great Eastern. We went on board her, and saw the machinery, and the tanks which held the cable. We had asked to see the mayor of the town, and when a gentleman jumped out of a carriage and accosted us, we took it for granted that this was he, and accepted his offer of a pair of fresh horses and a cup of tea. We went to his very pretty house, where his English wife received us graciously; and then D. heard that a deputation was waiting for him at the hotel. There he found the real Simon Pure, and spent an extra hour with him and the other magnates of the place; so that we left very late, and had a dark drive back through the woods.

The weather was quite lovely, and the trip extremely pleasant. At four o'clock we bought a Sydney paper, in which we found our arrival announced. Very sharp of the Sydney Press.

Louisburg: Sunday, 27th.—We are detained here by the fog. After church we went to look at the old forts; there are scarcely any stone remains, but Colonel Fletcher's military eye easily discovered the form and plan of the fortifications in the grass.

Monday, 28th.—We started this morning, and got on a good way before the fog came down upon us again. Fog—rain—Atlantic swell!

Tuesday, 29th.—Still very foggy. We had great doubts as to whether we should get into Halifax at all, and stories of ships being kept out for three weeks were rife. However, with great care, we poked our nose in just at the right place, and at two o'clock appeared in the harbor, to everybody's astonishment.

It was so wet we did not go ashore, and put off our landing till next morning. The Lieutenant-Governor and Mrs. Archibald came to see us, and arrangements for endless gayeties were made.

Wednesday, 30th.—At twelve o'clock we landed, on a slab of marble which commemorates the arrival of the Prince of Wales on the same day, thirteen years ago.

The weather was most dull and muggy, and gave a certain melancholy to the ceremonial of address reading. Fred and the Colonel had been exulting all the way upon again seeing "real soldiers," after all the Volunteers that have welcomed us in other places; but I have been provided with a fund of chaff against them by the non-arrival of the "real" guard of honor, who made some mistake, and turned up an hour later at the Government House, instead of at the wharf.

I received Admiral Fanshawe, his wife and daughter and son, in the afternoon, and when the day cleared up and the sun shone we saw that we were anchored in a very cheerful place close to the town. Dartmouth, which is almost a part of Halifax, is on one side of us, and woods and villas and large institutions are dotted round the Bay, while at the mouth of the harbor is a small fortified island. There is one man-of-war here, and we have just missed the Flying Squadron.

There is a question as to whether Parliament should be prorogued on August 13th or not, and the papers are advising the Governor-General, and abusing him in advance, if he does not follow each of their different counsels.

Thursday, 31st.—Lady Harriet and I went a drive with Mrs. Fanshawe, and saw the North-west Arm and Bedford Basin, and enjoyed the country drive; the weather was lovely.

In the evening we held a Drawing-room at Government House, and had the pleasure of "full-dressing" in our cabins. We got ashore in safety, and had a very successful gathering. Every one said, "We did not know there were so many people in Halifax." Going back to the ship, we found ourselves in a fog, and my feathers and tulle were much the worse for it. Dent says, with indignation, "Every day in this yacht takes pounds and pounds off the value of your clothes."

Friday, August 1st.—This was the day of the Regatta, and, had it been fine, it would have been a very pretty sight; but as there were fog and rain, little except the lunch took place.

We had a great dinner at the Lieutenant-Governor's, which was long but pleasant. One of my neighbors was the R. C. Archbishop of Halifax, a clever, amusing Irishman. The dinner had rather a funny finale. Mr. Archibald proposed the Queen's health, and we all stood up to drink it; the band played the National Air, and at the end of the usual eight bars we all prepared to sit down. But no; the band went on—a slight smile passed down the table; eight bars more—the band strikes up another verse; until at last, after several of these unexpected beginnings, the whole of the solemn and stately party broke out into a hearty laugh.

There was an evening party after dinner, and D. and I walked about and talked to all the strangers till 11.30 o'clock, when we returned to our ship.

Saturday, 2d.—Early this morning we went to visit the fortifications, and saw three different sets of forts. We returned to the Druid at two, and had the Local Government to lunch. They are in opposition to the Dominion Parliament, and their papers were rather disagreeable about our visit here; but I am happy to say they have set aside all political differences for the moment, and really seem as if they could not do enough for us. The result is, that next week we have four balls, three monster picnics, three dinners, a concert, a cricket-match, and a review. Is it not fearfully kind? “What shall I wear?” is a question I must debate seriously every day.

We dined to-night at Admiralty House with Admiral and Mrs. Fanshawe, where we met the same people as last night and a few sailors. One guest, a midshipman, was Prince Louis of Battenberg.

Sunday, 3d.—We were to go to the English Cathedral to-day, but our coachman, after driving us to the Roman Catholic Cathedral, proceeded to another church, at which we remained, and only discovered afterwards that it was the wrong one. It was a lovely afternoon, and we sat on deck till bedtime.

Monday, 4th.—A day of Herculean labors! At 8.30 A. M. D. went to breakfast with Admiral Fanshawe, to see his beautiful drawings. At ten we rowed down to the Dockyard to meet him, and all went on board the Royal Alfred. She and the Spartan manned yards as we approached, and then we got on board and went into every hole and corner of the ship. We had finished the inspection about 12.30, when we returned to the Druid, and prepared to receive a party at luncheon, including the Lieutenant-Governor and the Admiral. No sooner had we finished this meal than we started for a picnic given by the Irish Benevolent Society. D. and I sailed to it in our own little boat. The rendezvous was at McNab's Island, and we were received on landing by gentlemen wearing green sashes. The President armed me up the hill by way of helping me. He, of course, impeded my progress considerably, and when he stumbled and nearly fell, told me that it was "the blind leading the blind." There was a lovely view from the door of the large picnic shed; but we had to go in at once, and dance a quadrille. At five we had a "cold collation" and many toasts. The old Archbishop was rather amusing. When the chairman, who proposed his health, said he had known him for "forty years," he groaned aloud, which made us all laugh. We returned to the Druid at seven o'clock, and having re-dressed and re-dined, we left her again at eight, to attend a promenade concert in Horticultural Gardens. We did not "promenade" at all, but sat on the center one of three stages, a bright gaslight thrown full upon us, and an immense crowd looking on. On one side was the band of the 60th Rifles, and on the other that of the 87th. They played in turns, and we remained till the end of the performance. To-day, at any rate, we have earned a night's repose.

Tuesday, 5th.—Lady Harriet and I went a little shopping expedition this morning. At one shop I saw a poor woman who had come 250 miles to ask me to get her husband out of prison. I fear she did not believe that I really had not the power to do so.

We were given a picnic to-day by the 87th Regiment. D. and I sailed down to the Island about five o'clock.

There was a great number of people, and it was very pretty and amusing.

When it was quite dark, we went out lobster-spearing. We had two boats, and two great torches in each, and we stood up—with poles forked at one end in our hands—and watched the bottom for lobsters. Presently we saw one crawling along; I made a grab at him, but missed. Then came a second; this time I was more careful, and aimed my weapon slowly at him, putting the fork right over his back, and then lifting him, kicking, into the boat. It was very exciting. We were only able to stay a very short time, but we “grabbed” at five and brought home three.

Wednesday, 6th.—A luncheon party on board, which went off very well. Then a visit to a great lunatic asylum—a beautiful one, so gay and clean and quiet. Almost all the patients were out in the grounds, the band playing, and everything and everybody happy and peaceful. It seems to be admirably managed, and the view from the building is splendid. D. dined with the Archbishop, and Lady Harriet and I with Mrs. Fanshawe. She had the Prince-Midshipman and some other sailors to meet us.

Thursday, 7th.—We had another great lunch on board, which went off very well, in spite of the weather being rather wet and cold.

In the evening D. dined at the Club, and made a speech upon the absolute impartiality of the Governor-General in party matters (there is great strife going on now), which was extremely well received. He ended by saying: “As a reasonable being the Governor-General can not help having convictions upon the merits of different policies. But these considerations are abstract, speculative, devoid of practical effect on his official relations. As the head of a Constitutional State, as engaged in the administration of Parliamentary Government, he has no political friends, still less need he have political enemies; the possession of either—nay, even to be suspected of possessing either—destroys his usefulness. Sometimes, of course, no matter how disconnected his personality may be from what is taking place, his name will get dragged into some controversy, and he may suddenly find himself the subject of criticism in the press of whatever party may for the moment be out of humor; but under these circumstances he must console himself with the reflection that these spasmodic castigations are as transitory and innocuous as the discipline applied occasionally to their idol by the unsophisticated worshipers of Mumbo Jumbo when their harvests are short or a murrain visits their flocks." D. met me afterwards at a ball at the General's, where he had to dance everything till two o'clock.

Friday, 8th.—We had a large lunch on board, and after it went to a review of the garrison and Volunteers on the common, and, as the afternoon was lovely, it was a very fine sight—red coats, brilliant staff, His Excellency and Fred riding about, cocked hats, rifles, bands, artillery, engineers, a sham fight, a large number of spectators, etc.

To-night we had a really beautiful ball, given by the Legislative Council, in the Parliament Buildings. The ball-room is very lofty, has handsome cornices, and several full-length oil portraits hanging in it. The whole of the walls were covered with white calico, striped with bands of pink; over the doors and window were "D.s," surrounded by pink-and-white flags; the curtains and all the windows were pink-and-white tarlatan, and it was all very bright and finished-looking. The supper-room was hung with real flags, and the entrance-hall was converted into a grotto of ferns. There was plenty of air in the dancing-room, and a very good band, and we really enjoyed it very much (you know there are occasionally entertainments which are more duty than pleasure).

Saturday, 9th.—The political difficulties to which I have alluded call D. back to Ottawa, and he has had a very busy morning, writing farewell letters, and making arrangements for the long journey, which he begins tonight. If he had gone by rail it would have taken him at least seventy hours; but he luckily catches an English mail steamer on its way to Quebec, which will take him part of the way, and will leave him within twenty-four hours' journey of Ottawa.

In the afternoon we went to a monster picnic given to us by the citizens. The day was lovely, and we sailed down to McNab's Island in our boat. The Mayor, who received us, led us to the large shed, of which I have already told you, where all the people were waiting for us. We danced a quadrille, and were applauded after it, and then a few round dances. After dinner D. made a speech, in which he "confided me to the care of the people of Halifax during his absence," and very soon after this we were conducted down to the boats and returned to the Druid.

At eight we went to Government House, and were met there by a torchlight procession, and by a grand fire-engine demonstration, the engines preceding us, and being brilliantly illuminated. Many of the houses also were lighted up, and there was an immense crowd in the town, which we drove slowly through, back to Queen's Wharf, where a guard of honor was in waiting, and where D. said "good-by." The torches all remained at the pier till we had reached the Druid; it was a beautiful sight.

D. and Colonel Fletcher got on board the Nestorian at ten, and we watched them steaming past us; both we and they sent off some rockets. And now, here am I, alone for a week, doing "Governor-General" at Halifax.

Monday, 11th.—This was a very tiring day. In the morning I had a great many things to do for D., and in the afternoon I had lunch with the Archibalds, which lasted till after four; and at 6.30 had to be at the General's* house for dinner.

He was too ill to appear, and we were a small party of eight. After dinner we proceeded to the theatre, where we saw "Still Waters Run Deep" and "Under the Rose" acted by amateurs. There were some excellent actors, and I enjoyed it very much. I received three bouquets, which I carried together in an enormous bunch. The best performers were Major and Mrs. Hall, Captain and Mrs. Mitchell Innes, Captain Wallace of the 60th Rifles, and Mr. Poe, who is on the Royal Alfred.

I went to supper at the Artillery Barracks, and I believe there was dancing afterwards, but, mercifully, I knew nothing of it, and left before there were any symptoms of such an intention. I was so very tired.

Tuesday, 12th.—Mr. and Mrs. Robinson came on board to say "Good-by," and I had a lunch for fourteen people. My guests were two handsome Toronto girls and two admirers of theirs, the Lieutenant-Governor and his family (five), and Captain and Mrs. O'Grady Haly. He is the General's son and A. D. C.

It was a lovely afternoon, and after lunch we drove through the Horticultural Gardens to a cricket-match—the 60th Rifles against the Garrison.

Then we dined with Admiral and Mrs. Fanshawe,

* The late General Sir W. O'Grady Haly.

and went with them to the ball on board the Royal Alfred.

I did like this entertainment. The ship was close to the wharf. The deck was divided at the mast into two parts—supper-room and ball-room, and at midnight the partition was taken down. The funnel was beautifully decorated with arms—swords, bayonets, etc.—and was surrounded by jets of gas. The supper-tables were arranged between it and the mainmast, round which there was a rockery and fernery, in which water trickled and frogs disported themselves. The band sat upon a scaffolding round the mast. The whole was covered in with flags, and all the companions, compasses, wheels, etc., etc., were ornamented with plants. The poop made a second ball-room, also covered, in the shape of a bell-tent, and I had a seat there, and a good view of the ball. Those who preferred Nature could gaze out in the opposite direction upon the moonlit sea. I did not occupy the chair-of-state much, but danced, and enjoyed myself.

Wednesday, 13th.—I took a long rest this morning, and was ready in the afternoon to visit some Protestant charities.

The first was an orphan-home, and the second a very interesting reformatory for boys. It is on a new principle and seems to answer admirably. All the inmates are, or were, criminals. There are no walls, or bolts, or bars, and the boys are even allowed to go into the town “on honor.” They promise to return, and do.

They all learn trades, and do not leave the Home till they are able to earn their bread. They choose one of four trades, and are allowed to change their minds once. We saw them hard at work, carpentering, shoemaking, tailoring, and cabinet-making, the smaller ones cutting up firewood, and tying it in bundles. They also do gardening and farm-work, and have got small pieces of garden and pets of their own, and a band ; school-work is done in the evening. The boys looked very happy, and the few who at different times have run away generally return of their own accord.

This evening a ball was given to us by the 60th Rifles. It was a most successful one. The room looked like a very smart lady's boudoir, and was beautifully lighted with wax candles. I danced a great deal, and liked the entertainment extremely. We were not home till three.

Thursday, 14th.—I had to leave Lady Harriet in bed with an asthmatic cold, while I delivered myself over to the Roman Catholic Archbishop. Fred and I visited his house and his Cathedral, and a convent, and went on to his country place, where he had 150 people at lunch to meet me. The lunch was out of doors, and was really very pleasant. There was a band, and little wooden platforms, on which we were supposed to dance! —and did try to, but every one is worn out with past gayeties. I got back to the ship at five (having left it at twelve), and at nine I attended the Sergeants' Ball.

The political excitement is fearful, and we hear that the Opposition is going to ask for the Governor-General's recall !! So expect us home in disgrace.

Saturday, 16th.—We went to Dartmouth, and visited a rope manufactory, and a skate manufactory, where I was presented with a grand box containing two lovely pairs of Acme skates, for D. and me. We drove on seven miles, by a chain of lakes, till we came to an old-fashioned inn, where we had lunch. After this we went to a gold-mine, and saw all the process of extracting the precious metal, which I thought very interesting. This ended our sight-seeing. All day we went about in a procession of ten carriages. I gave a dinner to the amateur actors on board the Druid, and afterwards went to see them do "Caste," which was very amusing.

Monday, 18th.—We left our dear Druid early in the morning, and drove to the train, where the Lieutenant-Governor met us and escorted us for about six hours on our way. We passed through "Evangeline's" country to the Bay of Fundy, where we got into a crazy-looking steamer and sailed for St. John. Here the Mayor, Sheriff, etc., came to meet me, and there was a great crowd on the landing. Never was I so stared at as today. When D. is with me I feel that I am only part of the show; but alone, I have to bear it all. At the stations people looked in at the windows, and gazed at me while I ate sandwiches (of all the things in the world!); when we got to the hotel, a crowd outside eyed me, and a crowd inside stared at me, and on the stairs Yankee visitors criticised me, "I guess"; I went to my room for a little, and on my way to dinner I found them all still on the stairs, and they looked at me through the hinges of the door; when I came up again there was a couple walking arm-in-arm in my room, and three ladies looking into it; but I walked by them in so stately a manner that they sent me word they had only come to put some flowers there. Then the crowd outside would not go, and I had to stand at the window, and be cheered, and hear "God save the Queen" (to which I have no right whatsoever).

Tuesday, 19th.—D. arrived here this morning. He left Ottawa on Friday, slept that night at Montreal, and Saturday night at some place in the White Mountains,* where he found a ball going on. Sunday, he saw the scenery, and came on here at night.

* In the State of Maine.

The whole day was wet, and I can not say I was sorry to have a complete rest.

This is a fine hotel, upon American principles. The cooking is excellent, and we dine alone, and are waited upon by our own servants in a "private dining-room," which seems to us a very noisy one after the ship. The floor is covered with oilcloth, there are no curtains, and outside there is always going on a racket of plates and voices. Some kind of steam-engine thumps underneath, and carriages rattle down the street. We manage our dinner in a tolerably English fashion; but if we followed the "mode," we should eat in a great room, filled with various-sized tables, with a large "bill-of-fare" by us to choose from. After each mouthful a familiar waiter would lean his hand upon his knee, and, staring into our faces, ask "What we should like next?" Then, at every pause, and on every opportunity, he would pour us out a large glass of cold water, and place it ostentatiously before us—this even at breakfast, when the sight of it makes one shudder. Salt-spoons are unknown; you use your knife instead.

Our own sitting-room is very nice and comfortable. Everything is arranged so that one may require as few servants as possible; and this is lucky, for an idiot generally answers one's bell, and is merely bewildered by one's order.

There is a large public drawing-room, and the guests also perambulate the passages a good deal.

Our maids enjoy themselves, as they dine with the company, and can have many kinds of food, while they fill their heads with the fashions. Dent gave a sigh of relief when she dressed me this morning, as she said, "Well, I am thankful none of them have a dress like this!" "Them" are Americans, who are all in a sort of uniform of gray, with enormous buttons. I was amused by seeing in the papers this telegram: "Mackenzie has left for Halifax, to worry the Governor-General." Mackenzie is the chief of the Opposition, and D. is the Governor-General.

Wednesday, 20th.—At eleven D. and I went to some public room, where an address was presented, and at three the Reception Committee came for us, and took us in carriages all about and around the city.

There is a fine harbor, and we saw it well, and visited many of the pretty villas, and got, in fact, a good idea of St. John.

We dined almost directly we came in, and dressed for the Drawing-room, which was held in a great room in this hotel. It went off extremely well, and we stayed and talked to the people when the presentations were over.

Thursday, 21st.—This morning, early, we started to see the Regatta. I had a headache, and no sooner got on board the steamer, which was crowded with people, than I found that, although I might sit through four hours, I certainly could not talk and smile through them; so I went to the cabin, and lay still all the time of the races. The day was lovely, and the crowds of people on the shore and crowded into the rigging of the ships which filled the harbor made it a pretty sight and a most successful entertainment. We got home in the middle of the day, and were quiet till five, when a procession of the schools came to the door of the hotel, and we stood on the steps to see them.

I believe about 4,000 children were collected, and they were to have stood around us; but the crowd was so great it was impossible for them all to get through. A small circle was formed for those who were dressed up to represent the Provinces, and they gave me a bouquet; the other children had to stand where they could.

D. made a speech to the sea of heads, which few of the waves heard, but which will read well, I hope.

In the evening carriages were again ready, and we drove through the town in a procession.

Being part of the procession we saw little of it till the end, when our carriage stood to let the crowd pass us. There was an immense stream of walking lights, and all the fire-engines were lighted up, and ornamented with wreaths and flowers. Some of the horses had high arches of roses over their backs. The crowd was perfectly tremendous, and received us heartily. When we got into the hotel, we went to a window on the second story to look down upon the crowd, and they saw us and cheered.

Friday, 22d.—We had a long drive of fourteen miles to Chief-Justice Ritchie's house, where we were to lunch. The drive was through a beautiful country, and we had several warm greetings on our way. An arch was put up at one place, and a bouquet presented. At another private house the gate was hung with flowers, and the lady stepped out with a second bouquet for me, while a third was brought me further on.

We had lunch, or what was called a "high tea"; but there was no tea—only champagne. Returning home, we found several bonfires lighted along the route.

We reached our hotel at eight, and dressed for the ball. This was given in a new theatre, and was got up in a great hurry. The floor had to be laid down over the pit, and the decorations to be done, and during the day we heard that it was not nearly finished, and that it would be dull and wretched.

It was, therefore, a pleasant surprise when we reached the door and saw a brilliant room, the stage end with "Welcome" in gas-lights over two crimson chairs, the floor lined with ball-dressed people, the boxes and the dress-circle filled with spectators, draperies of red and green, flags, plants, and cages of birds (which sang and gave a rural sentiment to the entertainment), and a very beautiful string-band playing "God save the Queen." Supper was in the green-room. The ball was very successful and amusing. There were many Americans present; they dance in quite a different style from ours.

Saturday, 23d.—We felt very sleepy when we were called this morning, but we had to be down at the steamer at ten, and could not allow ourselves any lazy indulgences.

We drove with the Mayor to the wharf, and were met by a great crowd, and there was much waving of handkerchiefs and cheering as we left. Our journey was up a splendid river, the St. John, with lovely scenery all the way. About five miles from Fredericton we were met by three steamers crammed full of children and people, who greeted us warmly, and, having once begun to cheer, felt obliged to carry it on the whole way.

Mr. Wilmot, the Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, met us at the landing-place, with a number of people, and we had a most gracious reception at this, "the ambitious little city," "the celestial city," Fredericton.

We dined early, and went to the Exhibition Building, where the address was to be presented. It is a very fine building, though only made of rough wood, distempered; but it has good proportions, and is very large. There were at least 3,000 people present. The school-children sang, and after the speeches we walked round, and then got into a carriage and drove in the torchlight procession. The engines looked beautiful; but my pleasure was somewhat destroyed by my dread of fire. The torches were paraffin lamps, and the way in which many of them were spilled about the ground, and went on burning there, muslin gowns walking carelessly close to them, made me fear some bad accident. Rockets and Roman candles were also flying wildly about.

This Government House (where we are staying with the Wilmots, who are both most kind to us) is a very good one; the river passes the house, and a very pretty flower garden goes down to it.

Sunday, 24th.—A pouring wet day, and very stormy. We got to the Cathedral in a close carriage. It is rather a fine one, and is quite finished—strange to say! The rest of the day we spent quietly, the greater part of the time in our rooms.

Monday, 25th.—The people of Fredericton had arranged a picnic for us to-day, so we started off on our business directly after breakfast. We went first to see an interesting settlement, the property of a Mr. Gibson. Eight years ago there was not a house in the place; now there are good cottages for the laborers, fine houses for Mr. Gibson and his sons, a very ornamental church, and a school. He has done everything himself, and the place is quite a Happy Valley. His business is lumber. His old mother, who left our neighborhood in Ireland fifty-fours ago, was so delighted to see some one from “home.” Her parents having objected to her marriage, never wrote to her, and I wish they could see her now, in her son’s fine house, surrounded by every comfort that money could buy her, her granddaughter playing the organ, and her son so much respected and honored!

After this visit we got into the train, and with a large company of people went thirty miles up the new line, and half-way back again, to a place on the St. John River, where an arbor of evergreens had been erected, under which 250 people lunched.

A band played, toasts were proposed, and all went off well, in spite of rather dull, cold weather.

In the evening there was a dinner and a party, the principal excitement of which was that Fred and a young lady disappeared for more than an hour into an illuminated garden ; that her parents were asking every one where their daughter was ; and that, consequently, all eyes were fixed upon the culprits when they returned. Fred has had a great deal of chaff to stand ever since, particularly as the father said "Good night, my son," to him.

We were told that, at the hotel where the young lady was staying, other young ladies remarked that "they thought it was very bad taste in a girl thus to monopolize an Aide-de-Camp" !

Tuesday, 26th.—We left Fredericton in the morning, accompanied for an hour by the Wilmots, the Sheriff, etc., and proceeded on our way to Woodstock, a drive of sixty-five miles. At a half-way house we changed horses and had lunch. We drove all the way through lovely scenery, following the river St. John, and enjoying ourselves very much. We reached Woodstock in time for dinner, and directly afterwards went to the Court House to receive an address, and to see a large assemblage of people. We finished the evening by driving in a torchlight procession. I can't say how many bouquets I received to-day !

Wednesday, 27th.—We had a fine day and a delightful drive, changing horses four times in the seventy miles. We lunched at a charming little inn, and slept at Grand Falls. To our surprise, we found two arches at this little place, all the cottages illuminated, magnificent bonfires, an address, and an assembly of people in the Court House ; and after we had gone to bed we heard "Rule Britannia" being sung all round the house. There was also a very pretty procession of birch-bark torches. The inn was kept by a North of Ireland lady, and was perfect! The Grand Falls here are very fine.

Thursday, 28th.—We started at eight punctually this morning, for we have 250 miles to go, and drove on as before, stopping to have lunch by the way, and sleeping at a little French inn. The family got up a dance when we had gone to bed, and we heard the fiddle going, and our servant instructing them in a Scotch reel, during half the night.

Friday, 29th.—We got up very early, and drove, drove, drove on through forest nearly the whole day. We saw one great fire in the wood, and were nearly choked as we passed through it. We missed seeing a beautiful lake owing to the clouds of smoke hanging over it.

We reached Rivière du Loup about five in the afternoon, and got a tug steamer to take us straight over to Tadousac.

There we found the whole party of children in their dressing-gowns, just going to bed. The five elder ones are looking so fat, and rosy, and well; but my baby is a mite indeed!

Saturday, 30th.—Our summer tour is now over, and I return to a prosy account of home affairs. We have done all we intended to do; and the drive of 250 miles in four days was a very pleasant termination to our tour. The Druid was to have met us at Rivière du Loup, but was detained by storm, and only reached Tadousac this morning.

CHAPTER IX.

THE FALL, 1873.

Tadousac : Monday, September 1st.—I seized upon a fine morning to bathe with the children. It is rather late in the season for a first dip, but I could not resist trying it, though the water is at all times extremely cold here. We prepared for the bath in our own rooms, and, covered with waterproofs, ran down to the water. My costume is of the brightest orange, and is very striking. We are very quiet here, and D. very busy. He is writing the whole day long.

Friday, 5th.—We went on board the Druid just before dinner, last night, and took Nelly with us for a little holiday. The night was rather rough, but the wind suited, and we reached Quebec early this morning. We found Mr. G. Brodrick * at the hotel, and D. brought him up to stay with us; he is very pleasant, and gave us much English news. I drove him to the Montmorency Falls, and just as we were on our way to the Natural Steps we were caught in a heavy shower, and got rather wet. These steps are very curious. The river narrows at this place, and has cut a regular staircase in the rock through which it makes its way. D. did not move from his desk all day; he was up till two, and the clerks till four, and the steamer had to wait half an hour this morning (Saturday) for the monster dispatch.

* The Hon. G. C. Brodrick, now Warden of Merton College, Oxford.

Friday, 12th.—We gave an outdoor afternoon party on the platform, and were anxious about the weather, which turned out to be perfectly lovely. The amusements consisted of a band, dancing, a bear, and my children (who all arrived in the morning) to be looked at. Basil was a splendid sight, and had the air of Henry VIII, as he sat back in a small rocking-chair, with his sturdy form and rosy cheeks. The others are very flourishing, and the “family” did us credit, particularly as I did not show my baby, of whom I can not yet be proud. Instead of her, we exhibited the Queen’s present to her godchild. It is a large medallion, with Her Majesty’s head in raised gold in the center, surrounded by rows of diamonds, pink coral, and pearls. On the back is engraved, “Lady Victoria Alexandrina Blackwood, from her godmother, Victoria R.”

Saturday, 13th.—The day was pouring wet. I had a visit from a charming lady, a Miss Florence Lees.* She has been thoroughly trained as a surgical nurse, and did nurse, and underwent great fatigues (not to say danger) in the Franco-Prussian War. She wears the Iron Cross, and another order, which only three ladies possess. After nursing twenty-two men through typhus fever before Metz, she took charge of the Crown Princess’s Ambulance at Homburg. She has been sent out to visit the hospitals in Canada and the States; and all anti-women-working people ought to see her!

Monday, 15th.—I took the children to some athletic sports, and after lunch we drove out to the Cemetery. It is a very pretty one, and the trees are most of them decorated with a crimson or a golden branch—the first touch of autumn.

* Now the wife of the Rev. Dacre Craven, Rector of St. George the Martyr, Holborn, London.

Wednesday, 17th.—A football match took place this afternoon. The Dufferin Club were dressed in blue-and-orange jerseys, caps, and stockings; and the B Battery (the Citadel soldiers) wore red. Colonel Fletcher played on their side. The soldiers were somewhat rough, and one gentleman had his nose broken. The Dufferin Club won.

Saturday, 20th.—The Stadacona Hunt met to-day, and had, as usual, the worst possible weather. I drove out with the children to see the meet, and they were amused for a short time watching the jumping; but we felt so cold that we took advantage of a heavy shower as an excuse for returning home very soon.

Monday, 22d.—I inspected two convents this afternoon, which D. had visited without me last year. The first was the “Bon Pasteur.” The Misses Carron and some other young ladies were there to meet us, and to take charge of my A. D. C. The inspection was very long. First I was introduced to all the nuns, and specially to the Irish ones; and I saw the novices, and the school-children, who sang and read an address; then we passed to a large room where the penitents were collected, and observed how they had given up the pomps and vanities of the world, for the most unbecoming dress possible. We looked at the beautiful embroideries, and at the useful work the nuns do; admired the chapel, and visited the reformatory school, besides going into every bedroom, etc.

Having thoroughly done the “Bon Pasteur,” we proceeded to the “Grey Sisters,” who take charge of old people and orphan children. Here I visited three different divisions of the schools, and in each room found a prettily-decorated throne, songs, and a request from the youngest child present for a holiday. The Grand Vicaire was my spokesman on each occasion. He went round with me and made little exhortations—thus relieving me of the necessity of finding something to say to everybody.

Tuesday, 23d.—Such a wet day! We just managed to get out on the platform for half an hour, for a game of very odd football with a brick, with the children, and had to give up all hopes of dancing there in the evening.

We had a dinner party, and then a “drum”; and as the balcony failed us, we opened our one passage, and the young ladies promenaded up and down, and drank tea, and cracked crackers, and had supper, and seemed to bear the disappointment about the dancing very well.

Wednesday, 24th.—We had a bride and bridegroom to dinner. They have been married six weeks, and are taking an immense tour, on their way to Japan and India. I am quite surprised at the small quantity of clothes she carries about for so extensive a tour, and one comprising so many climates. Two serge dresses, one “good” silk, cut square, and a black silk skirt with a white “top”: with these, she has entered into the smartest New York society, and is going round the world.

Saturday, 27th.—This was a most lovely warm day, and the weekly Paper Hunt was a very gay affair. About thirty people were riding, and nearly twenty carriages following. We saw the jumping very well, and the country looked quite beautiful with its autumn-many-colored hills, the blue river, and the gay villages with their shining spires and roofs. The riders found the sun almost too hot.

Wednesday, October 1st.—In the afternoon I took the children out to see a collection of birds made by Mr. Lemoine. The trees in his place were lovely, the leaves being now of the most brilliant colors—some trees perfectly crimson, and others orange, with yellow ones and dark green firs all mixed.

Thursday, 2d.—We were surprised this morning to find it snowing; but the day cleared up, and after our dinner the young ladies and the “drum” generally danced out of doors on the platform. We had a very nice party: the dancing amused some, and the Boston Quintette Club, who are here now, brought their instruments and played beautifully to us; we had supper, and people left after twelve o’clock.

Saturday, 4th.—The ground covered with snow, and a dismal snowstorm still going on. This is rather early to begin winter, but we hope to see the ground once more before it disappears until May.

Monday, 6th.—A very wet day; our intended visit to the Indians, and all the sports of the week, postponed. Mr. and Mrs. Rothery * arrived. He is the British Commissioner who is to settle the fishery part of the Washington Treaty. His wife, George Dallas (his secretary), and a young Mr. Russell, are with him. They lunched with us.

Tuesday, 7th.—Fred went off before breakfast to train for the race which he is to ride. He has scant hopes of winning, as he walks a stone over the proper riding weight, and his horse has just come off the grass. In fact, his only chances lie in the possible misfortune of others.

Mr. and Mrs. Rothery dined with us, and we went to the Sergeants’ Dance, where we opened the ball with the Sergeant-Major and his wife.

Wednesday, 8th.—I visited an asylum for old women, and paid a morning visit to the Ursuline nuns. The children were so astonished when a dozen cheerful ladies dressed in black appeared behind a double grating to talk to us. Basil and Hermie could not get over it at all, and Nelly seemed greatly amused. The key of the room into which we went was handed to us through a hole in the wall, so that nothing could be seen but the hand that held it.

* The late Mr. Rothery, Commissioner for Wrecks.

Thursday, 9th.—The weather was so beautiful that we could not tear ourselves away from the “home-view,” and remained on the balcony all day.

In the evening the Lieutenant-Governor, Admiral Hillyard, and twenty-four others dined with us, and we had a party. As the night was perfect, our guests danced to the light of the moon, and were much pleased with the entertainment. But it began badly, for when the band was wanted to play, it was discovered that the men were all asleep in bed, so there was nothing for it but to drink tea while we waited for them to awake and dress.

Friday, 10th.—We were startled this morning by fifteen guns,—our guns saluting the General (O’Grady Haly), who arrived by the Montreal boat. We sent down the carriage, and an invitation for him to stay with us.

We have begun to prepare for our ball, and I am trying to solve the difficulties we have to encounter in moving from Quebec. All our servants, plate, etc., have to be at the ball on Tuesday night. Then all has to be packed to start Wednesday afternoon; the servants are to get to Ottawa Thursday evening, and visitors come on Saturday. Parliament meets on the Wednesday after.

We went to see the “Stadacona Races.” I took the General, D. rode, and the jockey (Fred), of course, was on the course before. He wore a lilac jacket and cap, weighed twenty-one pounds too much, and his horse was not “fit.” There were twelve hurdles and seven brooks to jump. The "favorite" threw his rider at the first fence. The remaining three had a good race, and the end was most exciting, Fred coming in a very good second in spite of all his disadvantages. He rode beautifully. The other races did not interest us greatly, but the weather was magnificent.

Saturday, 11th.—The General inspected the B Battery before breakfast, and we looked on; and then I assisted at the first meeting of the "Clandeboye Football Club"—all boys under twelve. There are twenty members. They had two capital games, and afterwards elected a secretary, Archie being president.

Monday, 13th.—The morning looked bad, but the day cleared up, and it was fine, but excessively cold.

The athletic sports were most successful, and crowds of people were present, who seemed to enjoy themselves very much. The esplanade was fringed with people, bands playing and flags flying.

Tuesday, 14th.—The ball-room looked unpromising this morning. The decoration had yet to be done, and, worse than all, the platform, upon which we are so dependent for room, was covered with puddles. However, we set to work: sailors decorating the outside, and myself and maids the inside. Fred Ward got in three stoves which he set a-going under the tent, and with which he successfully dried the floor and the roof; still, the weather looked so bad that we got ready two of the children's bedrooms to act as safety valves should the company be unable to use the platform.

In the dancing-room I had three hooks in the middle of the ceiling, to use as keynotes to my ornamentation, and from these I brought ropes of pink, white, and blue tarlatan, and made the room look like a tent, with a chandelier hanging from the center of each group of ropes. The ropes were fastened all round to the cornice, which was finished off with festoons and roses. It looked very light and pretty. There was a heavy shower at six o'clock, and then it cleared, and everything went off well. The platform was so popular that it ended in our having almost too much room in the ball-room. The supper, too, Mr. Pattisson managed very well. The room only held sixty, and we were 330; but there was no crush, and the relays were kept quite distinct, and each sat down comfortably. The guests stayed till 2.30, having begun to dance soon after nine.

Wednesday, 15th.—We took a farewell walk on the beautiful platform before going down to the boat, where we found many of our friends waiting to say good-by. The Lieutenant-Governor paid me a state visit at the Citadel.

Montreal, Thursday, 16th.—We had a comfortable passage to Montreal, and were all glad of a good long night on board the boat. To-day D. was kept extremely busy seeing different people. We managed between two interviews to get a little walk in the streets, and at one o'clock, he being unable to come, I went to the Geological Museum, and was shown part of the collection of fossils by Professor Dawson, which I enjoyed very much. After lunch we had to start off immediately to take Mr. and Mrs. Rothery over the "Mont Ste. Marie" convent. The nuns had only two days' notice of our intention, but every preparation had been made, except white gowns for the girls, so they were in black.

After we had gone over the house accompanied by the Sisters, the Bishop of Montreal (an old man, with long, white hair), and the Archbishop of St. Boniface (Manitoba), we were shown into the salle de réception, where all the young ladies were assembled. Here we had music, and a little piece acted by the "Muses" and the "Graces," each stating the reasons why she was specially privileged to present the address to His Excellency. This had of course been composed for the occasion.

Friday, 17th.—We traveled up to Ottawa, and found all the children well, and the house looking so nice. Many improvements have been made, and our principal passages have had new crimson carpets, and white paint on the doors and walls; so they look very gay and smart. After all our travels, home looks very comfortable, and we should be very happy but for political anxieties.

The Judges came to bring D. the report of the Commission.

Saturday, 18th.—I was busy all day getting the drawing-room to look “lived-in.” The Rotherys arrived in the evening. The weather was wet and bad.

Wednesday, 22d.—To-night we had the Ministerial banquet, and were thirty at dinner. The only missing Ministers were Dr. Robitaille and Mr. Tilly.

Thursday, 23d.—We dressed for the “opening” before lunch—low gowns, feathers and diamonds, uniforms or evening coats—and at 2.30 set off in carriages: Mr. and Mrs. Rothery, Mr. Pattisson and I in one; Lady Harriet Fletcher, my three children, etc., etc., in others, and the Governor-General in a carriage-and-four behind us. He opened a bridge on his way, which is to be called the Dufferin Bridge, and then came on, and entered the House with a very brilliant staff—for he had this year a number of officers and friends in uniforms accompanying him. The Senate Chamber was full; numbers of ladies on the floor, and crowds of people in the galleries. D. read the speech in French and in English.

Friday, 24th.—At last we have a lovely day. I took Mrs. Rothery, Mr. Brodrick, and Mr. Russell to see the Chaudière Falls, and we also went over a lucifer-match manufactory.

Saturday, 25th.—I gave the prizes for some athletic sports. Mr. Brodrick and Mr. Rothery went to a Ministerial dinner, and brought us home much news. Lord Rosebery (who came to us to-day) dined with the Opposition; but, although they sat till twelve, they never mentioned the great fight which is coming off on Monday, and about which they were all thinking, but talked instead of Shakespeare and the musical glasses. The Archbishop of Manitoba (Riel's protector) dined with us.

Monday, 27th.—The great debate began; but I did not go to the House, and D. and I had Rideau to ourselves.

Tuesday, 28th.—I went to the House to-day, and remained till 11 p.m. I heard Sir Francis Hincks,* Mr. Macdonald, of Pictou (who is a very good speaker, but untrained), and a Mr. Glass.† It is supposed that Mr. Blake ‡ and Sir John Macdonald # are waiting for each other.

Wednesday and Thursday, 29th and 30th.—Our thoughts and time still occupied by the debate. The first day, two speakers took up the whole time.

Saturday, November 1st.—The weather is very wretched, and very English-wintery. It tries to snow, and succeeds in sleetting and being raw and dull.

I saw people, for the first time since my return, to-day; 134 visitors came. I had Lady Harriet and Mrs. Rothery and the young men to help me, and the afternoon was pleasant and like a party.

Monday, 3d.—Mr. Brodrick left this morning. We (ladies) went to the House of Commons at three o'clock.

* Sir Francis Hincks, member for Vancouver, British Columbia.

† Mr. Glass, member for London (city), Ontario.

‡ Mr. E. Blake, member for South Bruce, subsequently Minister of Justice in Mr. Mackenzie's Cabinet, 1873. # The Premier.

Before the recess for dinner, there was a little scrimmage over His Excellency's dispatches, and at the end of this we adjourned for two hours.

At a quarter to nine Sir John Macdonald rose and spoke for five hours, making a very fine speech, full of power, lively, and forcible to the end. He did not fail in the slightest degree while speaking, but when he sat down he was completely exhausted, and his voice was quite gone. Mr. Blake got up after him, but adjourned the debate in a few minutes, and will finish his speech to-morrow.

Tuesday, 4th.—I did not hear Mr. Blake. He spoke for five hours too.

Wednesday, 5th.—I drove into Ottawa, intending to hear the speeches and see the division, but at the Office I was told that Sir John was with the Governor-General. As the House would not sit without him, I remained in the carriage, and soon we saw Colonel Fletcher taking Mr. Mackenzie to His Excellency. Of course, we guessed that he had been "sent for"; and the groups of two and three who stood about turned their heads curiously and nodded in a knowing way.

We took our places in the House, and Sir John got up and briefly announced that the Government had resigned. The announcement was received in perfect silence.

The Opposition, directly it was over, crossed the House to their new desks.

Saturday, 22d.—This is the family half-holiday; so after dinner we went down to the ice, and exerted ourselves to learn the Dutch roll—mother and children and governesses struggling and tumbling about, but all making great progress.

Monday, 24th.—There is a regular snowstorm going on. Skating was out of the question, so we went out to toboggan. The snow was soft and loose, and we were nearly choked and buried in it; but, of course, the children liked this very much.

Tuesday, 25th.—We were inveigled down to the ice in a biting cold wind, but were too much blown about to learn anything.

Monday, December 1st.—D. had a party of Scotchmen for curling and lunch (St. Andrew's Day), and we drank the "Queen of Scotland's" health. This was the opening of our new Curling Rink. It is close to the Skating Rink, and the tobogganing hill is on the other side; so we have quite a nest of amusements there.

Wednesday, 3d.—Alas for the thaw!—our Rink was just right, and now all the ice, and all the skating, disappears! It is in a terrible state—all over lumps and bubbles, with dead leaves frozen into it, which, as you know, burn holes in the ice.

Saturday, 6th.—Being the twelve children's half-holiday, Saturday has now become a weekly festival. We skated all the afternoon, and after tea had a great rehearsal of the children's play. Mr. Dixon exhibited a magic lantern, too, which, though only partially successful, was received with shouts of delight.

Monday, 8th.—Thermometer 18° below zero. The day looked dull, but we had a most delightful skate on the Ottawa—clear, smooth ice, and any amount of space. I found myself able to go more than a mile as fast as possible on the outside edge. The children enjoyed it immensely.

Monday, 15th.—D. went into Ottawa, and came back in time for a short skate. In the evening we had some of the new Ministers to dinner. I am trying to become a Grit, but I can't quite manage it. It takes me as much time as the outside edge backwards. I sat between Mr. Mackenzie and Mr. Cartwright: I like them both, and the latter is very talkative, and pleasant. Mr. Mackenzie is very straightforward and nice, and very Scotch, in accent and in looks. On the other side of him sat M. Letellier St. Juste, a French Canadian, and then came Mr. Vale, from Halifax, and the Haligonian Prime Minister, Mr. Almon. We also had the head of a large deaf-and-dumb institution at Belleville, who is very anxious for us and "family" to go down there to see a pantomime done by his pupils, and thinks a journey of six hours absolutely nothing for the purpose.

Friday, 19th.—We attended an amateur performance in aid of a charity. It was very good indeed. The first part consisted of "waxworks" done by the beauties of Ottawa. They certainly have a talent for tableaux, for I never saw anything more perfectly still than they were—although they were "on view" for nearly half-an-hour at a time. Each one was wound up in turn, and went through its performance admirably.

Tuesday, 23d.—I drove into Ottawa on a Christmas shopping expedition, skated in the afternoon, and dined at six, as we had to go and give prizes to Protestant schools in Ottawa. The room was very hot, but the "exercises" went off well, and 200 people had to be sent away for want of space. Children read and sang. D. received an address, and replied to it, and we did not give the prizes, as there was not time.

Wednesday, 24th.—Gawen and Fred* arrived this morning, both looking very well. They found me busily arranging the Christmas-tree. Gawen began his skating, but at present he looks very tall and shaky on the ice.

Thursday, 25th.—The church was beautifully decorated for Christmas.

* My brothers, Captain G. Rowan Hamilton, late 7th Dragoon Guards, and Captain F. Rowan Hamilton, A. D. C.

Lunch and a little skating filled the afternoon, and at five the children's Christmas really began. There were ten of them under eleven for tea, and very pretty the table looked, with their little fair heads all round it.

The tree came next, and was a great success: every one seemed to get what he wished for, and the books, toys, etc., will be thoroughly appreciated during the week's holiday.

Saturday, 27th.—This morning we attended a performance at St. Joseph's College. The house was beautifully illuminated outside, and we had songs and addresses, and a little French play acted by the students. It was a good night for sleighing, and the drive home was pleasant.

Wednesday, 31st.—We had our first skating party to-day, and I was able to perform the outside edge backwards and forwards quite well enough for public display. About seventy people came, but there was not enough snow for tobogganing. After the outdoor amusements we danced in the ball-room, and I think all enjoyed themselves very much.

CHAPTER X.

OUR SECOND SEASON AT OTTAWA.

Thursday, January 1, 1874.—D. had, unfortunately, a bad cold and headache, and so I was obliged to receive the gentlemen of Ottawa by myself. You remember that they pay visits to all their acquaintances on New Year's Day, and that every lady in the land remains at home to receive them. Two hundred and seventy came to see me, greeted me, and passed through the drawing-room into the dining-room for tea or champagne—mostly champagne! One very odd man appeared whom I had never seen before. He said to me, “Ah, very sorry indeed to hear that Lord Dufferin is ill; he is such a great fellow, it really would be a pity if anything were to happen to him. . . . Do I speak to Mr. Hamilton?” Fred got him off into the dining-room, where he continued, “I knew Mr. Conway” (our other A. D. C., whose name was Coulson) “so well that I felt I knew the crowd, so I thought I would come to-day. Sorry His Ex. is ill; he is such a good fellow, always turning up everywhere. Awful bore this sort of thing, but one is obliged to do it.”

I have been busy the last few weeks teaching the children to act a little play, to be performed before an audience this New Year's Day, so, directly the last of my visitors had gone, I rushed to make final arrangements on the stage, to visit my patient and get him up, to dress myself, and to dress the fairies.

Every member of our two families* between the ages of twelve years and eight months appears either in the play or in the tableaux which come after it, and I only wish you were here to see how well they all do it, and how pretty they look!

In the piece they represent imps who, clad in the gayest attire, are invisible to the mortal eye the moment they put on certain bright-colored caps, and visible again directly they take them off. The fun of the play consists in the way in which they are supposed to appear and disappear, plaguing the life out of a gigantic mortal, who either can not see his tormentors at all, or whose frantic attempts to catch them when he does, only lead him into the traps they have prepared for him.

My little troop entered fully into the spirit of the plot, and were so delighted with Fred's acting in the part of "Grumps," the troubled mortal, that they were really holding their sides with laughter, and there certainly was more nature than art in their representations of the mischievous imps.

The tableaux were equally successful, and though an eye was occasionally opened during the "Sleeping Beauty in the Wood" scene, and then conscientiously shut up again with unnecessary firmness—though one infant preferred to sleep with his legs in the air, and another made an uncalled-for announcement in the middle of a tableau vivant—the whole performance was most charming and successful, and actors, parents, and audience were all equally delighted.

Saturday, 3d.—The cold has diminished, and now there are only ten degrees of frost—which is nothing. One really does not feel cold half as much here as in England. The house is warm throughout, day and night, so that one does not shiver over one's dressing, or dread venturing out into the passages, or crowd round the fires in the rooms, as one does at home. And then, when one wishes to go out, one knows—thanks to tradition and to the thermometer—exactly what ought to be put on, and one wraps one's self up like a mummy, and drapes one's face in an indispensable and most becoming “cloud,” and thus defies the weather. We had a delightful skating party. The ice was lovely, and while numbers of graceful performers danced over it, other young men and maidens, to say nothing of fathers and mothers, were sliding down hills in toboggans, children were digging and burrowing in the snow, and nurses and perambulators added a homely aspect to the scene. You can't think how lively it looked—like an ant-hill decked in brilliant colors.

* Ours and Colonel Fletcher's.

When it got too late for outdoor amusements, we came in for tea, and the young people danced for an hour.

Monday, 5th.—The thermometer only 53°! The most unheard-of thaw, and the snow almost entirely gone. We were, however, able to skate about two miles up the Rideau—a very rare chance here. In the afternoon I actually drove on wheels into Ottawa, to begin a tour of inspection of the Institutions there with Miss Lees. We went first to the Jail, which we found comfortable and well kept; Miss Lees thought it the best she had seen in Canada. We next went on to the Protestant Orphan Home, a small house, with a stuffy sleeping and living room for the babies. A better house is much needed.

Tuesday, 6th.—We drove in a snowstorm to the Grey Nuns' Convent, and were received at the “Mother House”—the order having about ten establishments in Ottawa, of which this is the head. I visited the "Community," and the "Postulants," and went into the chapel, where the nuns were singing beautifully. From this house we walked to the Hospital, and after it to the Orphanage, and the Refuge for the Old. All these Miss Lees examined as well as she could. But she likes to turn up every sheet, and to peep into every corner, and this is a kind of inspection to which the good nuns are not accustomed. They like my perfunctory style much better, and I am amused when I go about with her to see her slipping behind the scenes at most unexpected moments, and surprising everybody by her searching questions.

Wednesday, 7th.—We finished the "Grey Nuns" today by visiting their school and an English Orphanage. Miss Lees is going to write a book about these things, so I need not record details.

Last night we kept Twelfth Night by practicing the "Boston Dip" and Badminton.

Thursday, 8th.—The weather is despairing. It will thaw, and even condescends to rain, which in a Canadian January is mean! Think of the ground being visible! and no skating! and umbrellas up! and driving on wheels!

There was, however, a sight to-day which I am glad to have seen. After the rain it froze hard for a short time, leaving ropes of beautiful clear ice hanging from the telegraph-wires, while the trees seemed to be the decorations of a fairy play. Words really do fail to describe the beauty of our woods while this "ice-storm" continues. There is a transparent sheath round every twig, the birch-tree being particularly pretty, with its small and well-known rods all cased in clearest crystal, while in the distance the trees seem to be made of silver with dazzling jewels on every branch. It reminds me of the story of the twelve princesses who used to disappear at night, and were, after much searching, discovered by the owner of an invisible cloak to frequent a garden whose trees were covered with precious stones. Like the invisible soldier, I can not resist breaking off branches and taking them home; but, unlike his, my diamonds melt.

Saturday, 10th.—The skating party, which had been postponed on account of the thaw, took place to-day, but resolved itself into an indoor party. The young ladies came in extra smart attire, feeling that they had not got to encounter the snow, and from 3.30 to 6 they danced. Some of them, I regret to say, evidently rejoiced in the bad weather! After the dancing the children performed their little play and tableaux again with great success.

Saturday, 17th.—This was a most lovely day for our skating party, so warm (about 10° below freezing-point), the tobogganing hill in perfect condition, and the ice good. I skated the whole time, only stopping occasionally to watch the toboggans come down: once Fred was left behind in the middle of the hill, and rolled to the bottom; another time, three passengers remained in the snow, while the fourth sailed on to the bottom of the slide.

Tuesday, 27th.—Thermometer 30° below zero during the night—about zero during the day. We skated a little, but there was a good deal of snow on the ice. At five o'clock the children were all ready in their fairy dresses to act their play to about fifty of their contemporaries. After the performance they had tea, and then games and dancing till eight. The guests were many of them very pretty, and all very well dressed.

Wednesday, 28th.—We have lent our ball-room for a concert in aid of our little church, and the morning was occupied in placing the three hundred chairs, and in preparing the stage.

The first part of the programme consisted of vocal music by amateurs. Then "Rosa d'Erina" sang four songs capitally. Three very pretty tableaux closed the entertainment: The Death of Cleopatra; the Expulsion of Hagar; and a group of flower-girls, Nelly being one of them. Cleopatra was very handsome, and was beautifully dressed. I think they will have cleared fifty pounds.

Saturday, 31st.—Saturday brings its usual skating party. The day was very cold, and we cut short the outdoor amusements, and had a very successful cotillon indoors.

Mr. Mackenzie, the Prime Minister, arrived. At the station he received a note from D. asking him to come out to us, which he did immediately, and stayed for dinner. On returning to Ottawa he found he had missed an ovation, which had been prepared for him after his very successful elections. I believe his majority will be about eighty.

Montreal: Monday, February 2d.—We left for Montreal, and had a long day in the train, but with books, and short naps, we got through it very well.

Tuesday, 3d.—Soon after breakfast, we went up to the Rink, the two Misses Bethune and ourselves being the only privileged persons, as it is shut to the public on account of the fancy-dress ball which is to take place there to-night; we had plenty of room, splendid ice, and a most delightful skate.

At eight o'clock we went back there for the ball, and took our places on a raised daïs at one end of a great building like Westminster Hall, with an architectural roof and ornamented rafters, its shiny ice floor illuminated by a thousand lights. As soon as the band changed from "God save the Queen" into some lively strain, we saw, from the far end, gay fancy-dressed figures gliding hand-in-hand down the ice, and passing us in couples, till at last the whole space was covered with Dolly Vardens, Nights, Knights, Queens, Savages, Red-Riding-Hoods, etc. D. skated in plain clothes; I only looked on and enjoyed the scene.

Wednesday, 4th.—D. visited the High School, and made a Latin oration there.

Tuesday, 10th.—We had a band at the Rink this morning, and skated to music. We danced the lancers and Sir Roger to their proper tunes, and then some waltzed and some "outside-edged" to the "Blue Danube."

I must tell you the names of some of our figures, though I fear they won't convey much to you. We execute the "Rose," the "Shamrock," and the "Thistle"; the "Ransom," the "Lily," the "Snail," the "Serpent," a chain of "eights," etc., etc. I wonder if ever you will see a performance?

Wednesday, 11th.—We took the Jail by surprise this morning, and inspected it. The women's department is most unsatisfactory, but as a new female prison is being built, little can be said. We found five women sleeping in a tiny cell, and three in a bed; and we saw prisoners with curl-papers and ornamental ribbons, and one with her hair much dressed, and with curls gummed down upon her forehead. The men were much better cared for.

After dinner Fred Ward, Mr. Thompson, D. and I went to see the games at the Rink, which looked very pretty, with its shining ice floor, its lights, and a quantity of flags. There were 211 entries for the races, and some of them were most exciting and amusing. The barrel-races went off with great spirit, and the boys, in all stages of creeping through bottomless barrels, rolling and struggling about, looked like strange shell-fish. Mercifully, none were hurt, for it must be a dangerous game. I gave away the prizes afterwards.

I have been elected a member of the Rink, and am the only lady who holds that proud position, being also, I believe, the first wife of a Governor-General who has ever skated here.

Thursday, 12th.—D. and I left early, and were “seen off” by a guard of honor composed of the students at Magill College—a fine-looking rifle regiment. We had Mr. Bridges’ car, and traveled in great comfort. We found it very cold at Ottawa. All the children in different stages of cold.

Ottawa: Tuesday, 17th.—There was a very exciting game in the Curling Rink between D. and Mr. Gordon, a Presbyterian minister. They play for the Club prize, and whoever wins to-day has to play another member, and so on, till the last man remaining gains “the horns.” This game was very close, “twelve all,” and the next shot must decide the winner. We all came in to watch the last strokes, and D. got “two,” and so won, and has a new antagonist to encounter.

Thursday, 19th.—We had a great expedition to-day. Our party filled two sleighs, and we started at eight o’clock in the morning, and drove three miles along, or rather on, the Gatineau river, and then eighteen miles through the “bush,” enjoying the winter scenery. It was a prettier drive than I had expected, being more open, less shut up in wood, and the horizon more varied than it usually is here. We saw the Gatineau rapids, rushing along black-looking through the snow; also something of the lumber-trade, for we met all the little sleighs full of wood coming to market. As they were loaded, we had to make way for them, and on two occasions we met in most awkward places, when we all had to get out, and lift our sleigh sideways on to the bank, and once we had to take out the horses. Another time we were at the top of a hill, and our foe wanted us to back down it. We asked if he could not back, but he exclaimed indignantly, "Why, there are enough of you there to lift that cutter of yours right over the mountain"—this of the great family sleigh!

We arrived at last at the house of a farmer, the owner of a cave, which cave was the end and object of our expedition. Here we lunched, and then, guided by the farmer, we proceeded on our way two miles along a lumber snow road, very narrow and bumpy. We left the carriages on a lake, and climbed up a hill to the mouth of the cave, where we took off our fur cloaks, and, each taking a lighted candle, entered the cave.

After examining a part of it, which I may call the hall and ante-room of this subterranean mansion, we proceeded on hands and knees through a very low passage to the drawing-room. We ladies had great difficulty with our petticoats, especially when in this doubled-up position we had to cross a pool of water on a narrow plank, and were greatly relieved when we were able to stretch ourselves upright again. New perils were, however, before us, and the gentlemen were astonished to find that Lady Harriet and I really did intend to descend the ladders which, in the darkness, appeared to lead down to the middle of the earth. But, as we very naturally observed to them, we had not driven twenty miles, and crawled on hands and knees to the spot, to be deterred by a small difficulty; so down we went, and saw two more large rooms in the basement of said mansion. Of course the place requires a geologist's eye to appreciate it thoroughly. It is made of—no; I won't even attempt to describe its origin.

We came out from our crawling very dirty indeed, and, returning to our carriages, drove homeward. Our sleigh was first, and we had just descended a very steep hill when we heard a noise, and looking back saw the second sleigh stranded in the middle of the road, its horses galloping madly towards us. Our footman rushed in front of them, and caught hold of their bridles just as they were upon us; he was knocked down between them, but was not hurt. The gentlemen all got into the broken sleigh, and finally arrived safe home, though they were run away with at every hill on the way back.

It snowed most of the day, and at the end of our drive we looked ideal Canadians.

Monday, 23d.—There was a very exciting curling match to-day between D. and Hutchison for “the horns.”

D. won by six points, and will now have to encounter another player. The boys made some calculations afterwards, in which they proved that each player had run eight miles, had thrown four-and-a-half tons forty yards, and had swept out the Parliament Buildings—pretty severe labor for one game!

Tuesday, 24th.—The “Fred’s”—for we have no less than five of that name in our household—played a match, the winner to be the “representative member” of the new “Viceregal Curling Club.” Brother Fred won it.

He and Colonel Fletcher dined with the Ministers, “in honor” of the Dominion Board of Trade, and Fred returned thanks for the ladies.

Saturday, 28th.—Colonel Strange, from Quebec, and Mr. Plumb, M. P. for Niagara, dined with us, and we had an “electric evening.” I don’t suppose you could have one at home; but here by rubbing our feet on the carpet, and then touching another person, we can produce a spark, and from any hot metal, such as the fireplace, we get quite a shock.

Mr. Plumb showed us a very curious thing. We went into a dark room, and rubbed the inside of the back of a book with a fur glove, and instantly the gilt pattern on the outside was illuminated by sparks, so that the whole design was as clearly marked out as it is in the daytime. He discovered this accidentally by passing a piece of fur round his hat, when the maker's name appeared inside in letters of light. Then we tried to light the gas, and I had the satisfaction of succeeding three times myself. I held a piece of wire, or a needle, in my hand, rubbed my feet on the carpet, and touched the burner; a spark was emitted, and the gas instantly blazed up. The children are extremely fond of charging at some unsuspecting victim with a finger or a nose, which instantly emits a perfect flash of lightning. One day I brought the baby down to the drawing-room, and Fred (who had just been rubbing his feet preparatory to trying an electric experiment) kissed her and gave her such a shock that she cried with fright.

Wednesday, March 4th.—The ice still demoralized, and every one grumbling. Both grown-up people and children find "walking on the boards" a sad exchange for skating, tobogganing, and curling.

Friday, 6th.—The Ottawa Curling Club came and played on our Rink for His Excellency's medal. They made a good score, and have hopes of winning it. Mr. Gilmour and Mr. Mackenzie spent the afternoon here and curled with D. The Premier brightened up very much during the "roarin' game."

Saturday, 7th.—It poured, and the beginning of the afternoon party was trying. Skating was out of the question, and a few ladies dropped in alone; I was in despair, but at last the two necessities—men and music—arrived, and we had a very nice little dance and cotillon. Hermie and Basil contribute greatly to the amusement of the company. She and Basil talk to every one, and are always in such high spirits, that the lookers-on like having them to play with.

Nowell (D.'s valet) won the cup, and I presented it to him; it is to have his name, and "Presented to the Viceregal Curling Club," etc., engraved on it.

Tuesday, 10th.—There was tremendous excitement in the Curling Rink to-day—D. playing another opponent, Mr. Russell, for "the horns." The game was very interesting. They had to make twenty-one points, and five times during the course of the game they were ties, D. winning finally by one—a very honorable and unexpected victory, as Mr. Russell is the "skip" of the Ottawa Club.

Tuesday, 24th.—There was beautiful tobogganing to-day. The children went down in every sort of way, double and single, standing, sitting, and lying. Once they tied four toboggans together, which looked like a raft covered with people—a rescue from shipwreck.

Friday, 27th.—A day of much ceremony. Diamonds, lappets, and feathers at two o'clock, when all drove to the Parliament Buildings, the Governor-General in carriage-and-four, and I in a quiet brougham, to a private entrance. I went into the Senate Chamber, which I found full of gay ladies, and soon we heard the guns which announced His Excellency's arrival. We all stood up to receive him, as he came in preceded by his Staff. He sent for the Commons, and the new Speaker made a little speech, and the President of the Senate replied to it. Then D. read the speech, first in English, then in French, and we departed as we came.

On my return I doffed my finery until after dinner, when I dressed up again, and we returned to the Senate Chamber to hold a Drawing-room ; it went off very well, and was quite a brilliant affair.

Saturday, 28th.—We turned out of the drawing-room to-day, to have it arranged as a second supper-room.

The conservatory was hung with Chinese lanterns, and everything that was possible done to embellish the rooms for an evening-party.

There was a band, tableaux, and some singing in the drawing-room, supper in two rooms, and I believe people enjoyed themselves.

Sunday, 29th.—We had such a nice walk on the Ottawa. The banks were lovely, clothed in icicles, and ice-grottoes, into which we got, had been formed in places. They were supported by enormous pillars of ice, and a fringe of large icicles shut us in.

Tuesday, 31st.—I went into the House, expecting to see Riel take his seat. There was great excitement outside, but he did not appear. We heard a very amusing debate about abolishing the sale of spirits within the precincts of Parliament. We were very busy at home preparing everything for a full-dress rehearsal of a selection from the opera of "Semiramide" and the little play of "One Hour," in which I myself take part. The rehearsal was successful, the servants making up an audience.

Thursday, 2d April.—Mr. Charles Kingsley * and his daughter are staying with us, and we took them over the Houses of Parliament, and had Sir John and Lady Macdonald one day, and Mr. and Mrs. Mackenzie another, to meet them at dinner.

* The late Rev. Charles Kingsley, author of Westward Ho! Hypatia, etc.

Saturday, 4th.—We looked on at curling to-day, and saw D. beat the “champion,” Mr. Gilmour, twice. Dr. Grant dined with us, and he and Mr. Kingsley were very happy over geological subjects.

Easter Sunday, 5th.—There was a great congregation, and we had an excellent sermon from Mr. Kingsley, appropriate to the day. He does not stammer at all in preaching. The gentlemen say that in the smoking-room he is most amusing ; but he seems shy, and is therefore less brilliant, in general society.

Tuesday, 7th.—D. walked into Ottawa, and in the street met Mr. Laurence Oliphant,* whom he asked to come to us at once, and to bring his wife. He is very pleasant, and she is a sweet, pretty little woman, very chatty. They belong to a curious sect, headed by a Mr. Harris. They have no objection to talking about it to us, but she tells me that in the community they never speak of religion, that they have no church, no services, and that every member believes, or, rather, disbelieves, what he likes. They look upon Mr. Harris as a “moral doctor,” and all their efforts in a “good” direction are employed in conquering their own faults by their own efforts—and Mr. Harris’s prescriptions; they also believe that their prophet actually suffers physical pain when his followers offend, and that they know when they do wrong themselves by a peculiar sensation in the throat. They consider themselves bound to spend all they have; not merely to give to charitable institutions, but to distribute it personally. They live in a district where they have farms, and the members all help each other as they can.

* The late Laurence Oliphant, author of The Piccadilly Papers, etc.

Friday, 10th.—D. curled, and nearly killed Mr. Olyphant with the exertion. I like both her and him very much ; and certainly their faith in what they do believe, and their conscientious performance of the same, are wonderful.

Friday, 17th.—The great ball given by the citizens of Ottawa in our honor took place to-night. The dancing was in the Senate Chamber—a very handsome room—and a new floor was put down for the occasion. I suppose two thousand people were present, but there were so many passages and promenades that the dancing was not too crowded. We much appreciated our hosts' kindness and hospitality.

Monday, 27th.—We were pleased to see in the morning paper that there are $900 (nearly £200) over, after all the ball expenses have been paid, which are to be given to charities.

Wednesday, 29th.—In the evening our play came off, and was a great success. People seem to listen with eyes and ears, and to be quite delighted. The whole company was good, and every one knew his or her part, and it went smoothly and with spirit.

After it was over I changed my dress in about three minutes, and came down to supper. Stray couples walked about the corridors, visited the conservatory, and had what is called “a lovely time.”

When I had shaken hands with the “six hundred,” and we were alone again, we had our supper, of which we were all very glad, for acting makes one so hungry !

Saturday, May 2d.—D. and Fred went out hunting, and had a very pleasant run.

The children tried a paper-chase. Colonel Fletcher was the fox, and the run was most exciting, the “hounds” shrieking all the way, and having some delightfully stiff timber to climb.

A Parliamentary dinner; five expected guests failed to come, and left a great gap at the table.

Thursday, 14th.—The Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia and Miss Archibald arrived to spend a few days with us.

Lady Harriet is expecting her sister and uncle—a great excitement in our small world; for, though our guests are numerous, our home-circle is small. We have very pleasant weather, and sit out a great deal, enjoying it; but as yet there are no leaves on the trees, and no plants bedded out.

Friday, 22d.—We had such a pleasant day, driving in two carriages to visit Mr. Gilmour's place on the Gatineau River, and to see his sawmills, etc. Lady Mary and Mr. Marsham, who arrived on Friday, went with us. The weather was fine, and the river very full; the rapids were magnificent, and it was very interesting to see the lumber go down them.

We watched the trunks of great trees turning and twisting in the whirlpools, passing from one current to another, dashing down waterfalls, disappearing in the waves, and coming up again on the brink of other rapids. We saw them reach a place where a number of men, with poles and spikes, stood by to harpoon and mark the passing monsters, sending those stamped with a "G" in one direction, and those with a "P" in another. After this, a further rush down the river brought the logs to a calm pool, where they were just recovering from their exciting voyage, when they were laid hold of by an innocent-looking cogwheel, up which they marched slowly and surely into the teeth of fourteen thickset saws, which sent them in pieces on a further sail, down a small trough of water, to the stack-yard. In addition to the almost human interest of this tragic performance, we had lovely scenery to look at, a good lunch to eat, a nice drive, and a row home in boats ; so we enjoyed ourselves much.

Monday, 25th.—The Queen's birthday kept. The morning looked bad, but we dressed ourselves up, and at eleven arrived in front of the Town Hall, where the firemen and engines were to be reviewed. We looked at and walked round them—the rain coming down a little—listened to an address, and then proceeded to the review-ground.

The Governor-General's Foot Guards looked extremely well ; but the weather was dreadful, and when I came to give away the colors it poured in torrents, so that the feathers in my bonnet stood on end, and I had to take off my veil and throw it away. You may imagine my mother's feelings when I turned round in the middle of the deluge and found that Archie was out in dancing-shoes ! We had lunch in a large tent, and D. made a speech, which you may read in the newspaper I send you.

Wednesday, 27th.—We made an expedition down the Slide to-day. D. paddled his canoe to the foot of the Chaudière Falls. Colonel Fletcher rowed there, and we took two carriage-loads, with five children—all in a great state of excitement. We found a magnificent "crib" prepared for us—flags and green arches over it ; and when we were all assembled, we started at a slow and stately pace on our journey over the Slide down to the Ottawa. It takes three waterfalls to reach the level of the river, and going over these is the greatest fun. We remained on our crib for some time, and then got on to a raft for tea, which we drank out of tins, without milk or sugar ; and we ate raft-made bread, which was excellent.

Friday, 29th.—We went up the Rideau in a carriage for about eight miles, and saw the Falls, which are very pretty. Had tea there, and came back in canoes, D. rowing me. There was a beautiful sunset, and the river was lovely—the scenery much more English-like and meadowy than it usually is here. There were some rapids to run, and we ladies got out, while the Colonel and D. took their canoes down. It was quite dark when we got home.

Saturday, 30th.—As it was a lovely day, and as the mosquitoes are, so far, very harmless, had tea out of doors. We carried the things down to the rocks, and the children were extremely happy attending to the fire, and jumping about at the edge of the water. The two families were present—ten old enough for picnics.

Tuesday, June 2d.—We drove about twelve miles into the country to the borders of “Meech’s Lake,” a pretty piece of water inhabited by swarms of mosquitoes. We drank our tea in a cloud of smoke, to keep off the tormentors, and then got into our canoes (which had been brought here in a cart) and explored the Lake. “We” means the Fletchers, Lady Mary Marsham, D., and myself.

Our expedition did not end quite pleasantly. It had been arranged that we were to get into a boat half-way and row home. The night was very dark, and the current tremendous. Presently we came up against a beam of wood stretched across the rushing river, which we knew had an opening in it through which boats could pass; but in the dark we could not find the place. The Colonel, who was rowing with D., said the ladies would have to get out, and that the boat must be lifted over the bar. Oh, it was disagreeable! We knelt on the narrow plank, with the rapid stream swirling under it, and I don’t think I could have done it but for a fortunate peg in my bit of plank by which I held on, and which gave me a certain sense of security. Lady Mary was so brave: she made no fuss at all. When the boat had been dragged over the beam we got into it again; but we had several more alarms about steamers, rafts, etc., and I was thankful when we got safe home without collisions or further accident.

CHAPTER XI.

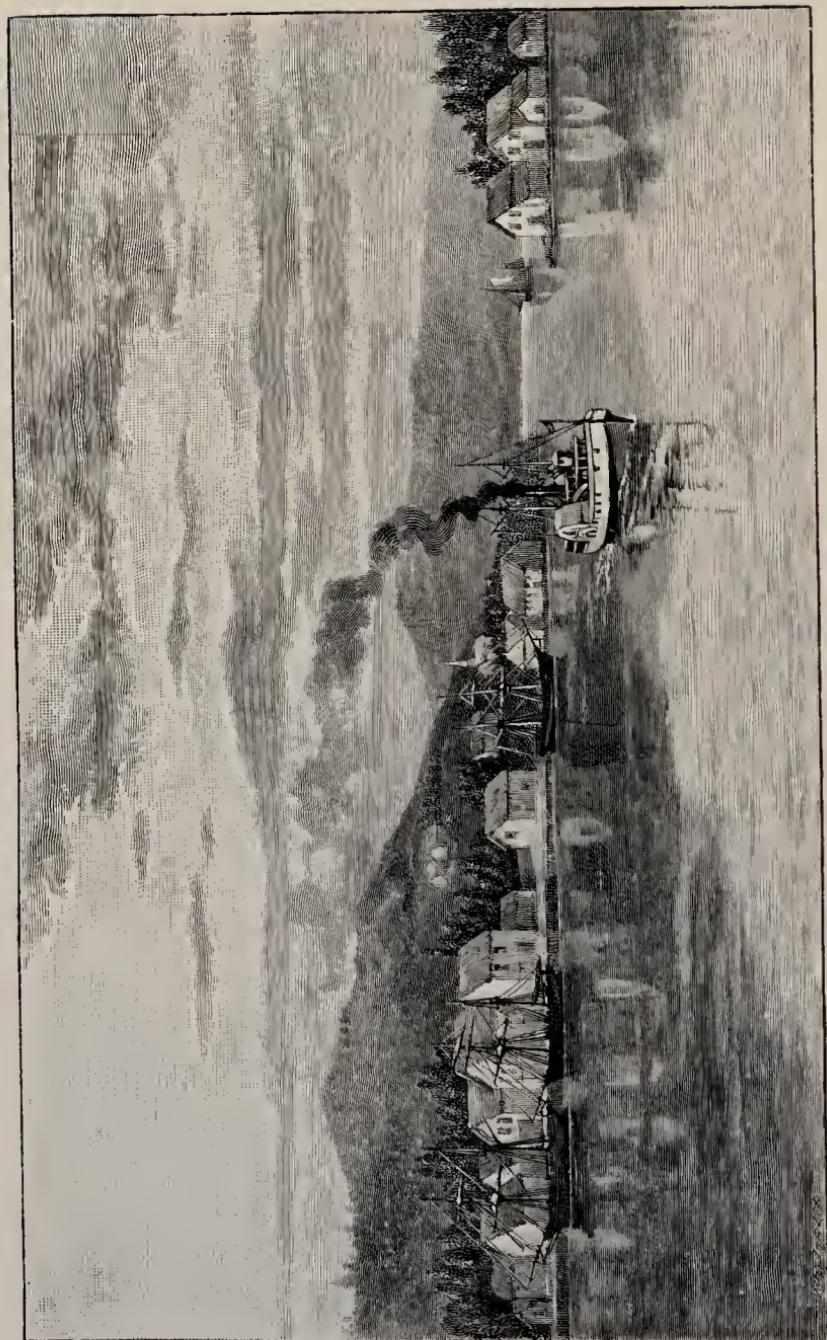

FISHING ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Quebec : Saturday, June 6th.—We left Ottawa yesterday—Archie, D., and I; Nelly was up to see us off, and looked a little melancholy at being left behind. We went by train to Prescott, and had two hours to wait for the boat, which had been detained by fog. We feared this delay would disarrange our plans, and make us late for the night-boat from Montreal; but as it waited for us, we made our journey successfully, and arrived this morning at delightful Quebec, where as usual we met with the most friendly welcome. People always seem so glad to see us here, and all the way up the town faces were smiling at the windows, and hats were off everywhere; it is just like coming home! In the afternoon Archie played in a foot-ball match—"The Clandeboye" against "The Rovers"; I need not say who won.

D. and I had a walk in the town, and then I unpacked the English box, which has just arrived, and which astonished me with the new fashions it contained. I can not yet decide whether to put on the bonnets forwards, backwards, or sideways.

Wednesday, 10th.—We went on board the Druid, and left Quebec. The day was lovely, and as we went down the St. Lawrence the coloring was beautiful everywhere. We passed numbers of sailing-vessels.

Friday, 12th.—Found ourselves in sight of Gaspé

this morning. Not a ripple on the water, and the place looking lovely. Mr. Eden, the vivacious harbor-master, came on board, presented me with a large Indian box which had been made for me, told us all about the salmon, etc.

D. went into the bush to see about our fishing-box. We have brought with us the pieces of a little bedroom and dressing-room, which are to be put together on the site, which D. walked eighteen miles to select.

The night was very bad—rain, snow, and hail. We are glad to be in harbor.

Sunday, 14th.—Rather a fine-looking morning, but cold. We went to church and had a good sermon—short and plain. In the afternoon we landed on the York side of the harbor, and drove along a good road.

We met a friend on the way, a farmer, originally from Cavan, who has cleared, and now lives upon, thirty acres of his own land. He and his wife have added fifteen to the population of Gaspé. He asked us up to his house, which was very comfortable: a large sitting-room, with three concertinas, books, etc., in it; a dining-room, kitchen, and nice bedroom on the ground floor, and everything very neat and clean. The view from his door—lovely.

Monday, 15th.—Our two rooms were taken off in the middle of the night to their destination on the St. John River, and D., Archie, and I soon went after them. We made the first part of the journey in a “wagon,” then got on horses, and rode at a jog-walk for three hours, when we reached our fishing-box. We gave all necessary directions there, and then mounted again to cross to the York River. When we reached Mr. Reynolds’s camp, which is situated on this rushing river, I got Archie some food, and then the poor little man had to start back again, and only reached home at ten at night. He was very proud of his long day, which prevented his acknowledging any fatigue.

Our host is so pleasant and kind, and we had a very agreeable dinner ; Colonel McNeill * and Mr. Monck are also here. Afterwards we sat around a fire outside, and then came in to write up the game-book.

Tuesday, 16th.—It rained early in the morning, but was sunny, though cold, during the day. I fished for a short time, and caught, or, rather, hooked, a “kelt”—an uneatable salmon, which has been in the river all the winter. D. caught one salmon of 14 lbs., Colonel McNeill two, and Mr. Monck two ; but it was considered a very bad day’s sport.

This is a beautiful river : numbers of pools, a very rapid current, very clear water. The woods have a great deal of birch in them, and the look-out is much more open than on most of the rivers.

On our return we had dinner, camp-fire, etc., as before. I have such a comfortable room, with carpet and curtains.

Wednesday, 17th.—D. fished vigorously all this very wet day with no result. The only fortunate person was Mr. Monck, who brought home two salmon, 26 and 27 lbs. The others caught kelt, and were very angry over those “unclean” fish.

Thursday, 18th.—We telegraphed last week to Fred and Dr. Campbell not to come, as there seems no chance of the fishing on the St. John beginning yet ; but to-day we hear that they have arrived. Colonel McNeill and Mr. Monck have most kindly gone up the river to a distant house in order to leave room for them here, as

* Major-General Sir John McNeill, V. C., K. C. B., Equerry to H. M. the Queen.

Mr. Reynolds insists upon having them. The day is terribly wet.

Saturday, 20th.—Fred and Dr. Campbell arrived here very early, having left the Druid at 5 A. M.

We had a very beautiful day as to weather, but the river had risen so much that there was no fishing. D. and I took a walk, and Fred upset a canoe, and sent himself and two men into the water.

Mr. Monck came down from his house with two salmon, one twenty-nine and the other twenty-two pounds.

Sunday, 21st.—At last we have a fine day, though it can not be considered a “midsummer’s day.” We took a walk, and sat round a “smudge”—that is, a fire of damp wood, which smokes and keeps the black-flies and mosquitoes off.

Monday, 22d.—Nice weather, but the salmon not rising. The river is much too high, and the current too rapid. I went down to the pool where D. was fishing in the canoe, and walked back by myself; but I am advised not to do so again, lest I should meet a bear.

Tuesday, 23d.—Here are the statistics of our fishing so far at York River:

Mr. Reynolds, five fish, weighing 23, 21, 33, 28, 12 lbs.

Colonel McNeill, twelve, weighing 24, 22, 11, 18, 24, 25, 27, 25, 24, 20, 26, 14 lbs.

Mr. Monck, seven, weighing 25, 11, 26, 27, 27, 23, 15 lbs.

Lord D., three: 14, 13, 10 lbs.

Fred, two: 22, 14 lbs.

So far we have not been fortunate. Last year Mr. Reynolds caught ten fish himself the first day he went out. Their respective weights were: 47, 37, 30, 12, 19, 20, 18, 30, 30, 10, the average being 25 lbs. This is marvelous in the way of fishing, and I record it as an interesting fact, though I don't suppose you will appreciate it.

Thursday, 25th.—Archie arrived to-day, and Mr. Reynolds left. D. had at last a good day's fishing, and came home with six salmon: 26, 25, 14, 13, 12, 10 lbs. Dr. Campbell caught one, 23 lbs., and Fred nothing. The day was extremely cold, and we were surprised that the fish rose at all.

Our mail arrived, and in the middle of his salmon-catching D. sent off dispatches.

Friday, 26th.—Fred was given the best pool to-day, and D. went up to the "Little Salmon Hole" and the "Flat Rock" pool. I walked there with him, a distance of about three miles through the woods, and Archie went up the rapids in a canoe. He and I then looked on at the sport, he amusing himself between times by cutting down trees with a hatchet and by feeding a fire with wood.

D.'s first fish was a very lively little one, which jumped and frisked about, and finally took him right down the rapids. It was 12 lbs. The second sulked, and merely kept a good steady pull on the line, keeping it up for an hour, and only making for the rapids at the last moment. It weighed 23 lbs.

Our lunch, which the men provided, consisted of lumberman's fare: bread fried in pork fat, and tea. We all came down in a canoe, the stream bringing us at a great pace.

We found that Dr. Campbell had not even seen a fish. Fred caught two, and having just finished a struggle with a twenty-six-pounder, he came home to dinner in very good spirits. This fish was already gaffed and in the boat, when it jumped out again, broke the top of his rod, and had to be played for another five minutes; so that it was a miracle he saved it.

Saturday, 27th.—We leave to-day to go to the St. John, so we had all our packing to do. Besides our clothes, there were two tents to be put up, and a sledge to be transported over the river, for carrying our goods through the bush. D. and Fred started to walk, and a few minutes after they left we saw a raft coming down the stream, with a little dog upon it, and a green tree floating over his head. Then a canoe came in sight, with Colonel McNeill and Mr. Monck in it, and we found that the raft contained the salmon they had caught, which they sent off with the dog as its only live passenger to astonish us. They brought home nineteen large salmon, the average being twenty-three pounds weight. Mr. Monck had caught eight one day, and five one evening.

We were soon after this ready for our start. Archie, Dr. Campbell, and I rode—I with a jar of cream on my knee. Our road was very bad, trees lying across it, and much mud and marsh to go through.

D. met us just outside our camp, and we were all delighted with our new habitation when we reached it. The men had worked very hard, and had made cedar-bark paths and fir plantations round the houses. The “village,” over which the Dominion flag floats, consists of two large tents for the men, and of a wooden house divided into two rooms. The windows have green mosquito-blinds over them, and the bed, white mosquito-curtains. There is a washing-table, and lots of pegs and shelves, and a little bit of carpet, which is a great luxury in the woods. A cedar path leads to the log-house, in which there is the sitting-room, and two little “cabins,” in which our guests sleep.

Opposite our door a bonfire burns, and when the flies are bad we have a row of smudges to smoke them away.

The kitchen is in another log-house on the other side, and from it we soon had an excellent dinner.

Nowell (D.'s valet) has made all these arrangements, and, in spite of many bites from the untiring flies, he works away with great good-humor and skill.

OUR HUT.

Monday, 29th.—The first fishing on our own river. The fishers drew lots for the pools, and Archie and I went to see D.'s success. He only brought two home when we returned to dine at two o'clock. The others had not seen a fish, so D. and Dr. Campbell resolved to go down towards the mouth of the river, the fish being only now on their way up. There is a little house there, in which they intended to sleep to-night. Archie went to fish in a lake close by, and brought home fourteen trout. Some of these we ate for tea.

Wednesday, July 1st.—Another very bad day, but, as it was Dominion Day, we had several flags flying and a great bonfire in the camp. D. and Dr. Campbell returned. They seem to have enjoyed their trip in spite of the weather, and if it had been good they would have had splendid fishing: as it was, they had fished till two o'clock in the day, and the former caught three salmon—21, 13, 11 lbs.; and Dr. Campbell five—21, 13, 11, 9, 9 lbs.

Thursday, 2d.—D. was up at a nameless pool, and caught five salmon before two o'clock. He was coming home when he caught the last, so he determined to bring it down to the house. I was hungrily watching for the fishermen's return to dinner, when I saw the canoe arriving with D. hanging on to a salmon. This was very exciting, and we saw the creature brought ashore without a gaff.

D. wanted me to fish in the afternoon, so about five o'clock we went again to the nameless pool. I stood up in the canoe, a man at each end keeping it steady with poles, and began to throw my fly. The fish did not come, so we changed the bait, and tried "Jock Scot" and "King Coffee." This royal personage was large and gaudy, and had, alas! a very big hook. "A rise!" "He's on!" Then I stand firm, and my friend jumps several times up in the air; but I hold him well in hand, and suddenly he spits out my fly, and is gone! Again we go up and down the pool with "King Coffee," and then we try the "Silver Doctor," and at seven o'clock another fish is on! This one simply tugs; he keeps a steady pull on all the time, and I do the same by him, and take care to give him no rest, but wind him up every time he attempts to lie quiet; once he jumps, and they say he is a large one. This game goes on for some time, and then my friend thinks he will take me down the rapids. I am still standing in the canoe, but keeping firm by pressing my knees against the bar across it. We went down half a mile hand-in-hand like this, and I began to feel that it was a question which of us would be exhausted first. A salmon-rod with a fish at the end of it is no joke! I began "to wish he were dead," and to say to myself that I never would go through such an anxiety again, for the fish is never safe till he is in the boat. At last we gaffed him, brought him safely to his death, weighed him, and found him twenty-six pounds—the largest caught here this year: so I am very proud of my success. The nameless pool is now the "Countess Pool."

Saturday, 4th.—A wet morning again. We packed up, and went down in canoes towards the Druid, fishing on the way. The salmon would not rise, and we had only three to show at the end of a long day. We left our boats in the evening, and drove to Gaspé, where we got on board the Druid, after saying farewell to our fishermen, etc.

We meant to start at once, but there was a fog outside, and we did not get off till four in the morning.

Tuesday, 7th.—A fog,—and the Druid at a standstill all yesterday, we not knowing where we were till three o'clock, when the mist rolled away suddenly. We anchored at night about fifteen miles from Tadousac, and came in there early this morning. The children were looking out for us, and Archie went ashore to fetch Nelly and Terence for breakfast, and to show off his steering.

We landed after breakfast, and found Hermie and Basil with outstretched arms at the top of the stairs, waiting to give us a warm welcome. Then we saw the baby : such a fat fairy, so pretty, with golden hair curling all over ; and large, dark gray eyes. Such a merry, happy little thing ; she stands at a chair, and crawls about everywhere.

Friday, 10th.—After breakfast we got on board the Druid—the Fletchers, Lady Mary Marsham, ourselves, and Nelly—and started up the Saguenay. At two o'clock we stopped to fish for trout, but the wind rose, and we were not very successful.

Then we proceeded on our journey, and saw a most lovely sunset, which turned the Saguenay hills into gorgeous masses of purple and blue with golden backgrounds. This arm of the sea is considered one of the great Canadian sights ; it is a rift in the rocks, and the water is very deep right up to the sides, but the hills are all the same height, which is somewhat monotonous. There are two enormous cliffs or capes, called "Trinity" and "Eternity," but it was very dark when we passed them, and we hope to see them better on our return.

Saturday, 11th.—We are anchored in Haha Bay, and D. and Colonel Fletcher started very early for a day's salmon-fishing in a small river near. We ladies followed later, and found that the fishers had had splendid sport. We were able to watch them, and we had some most exciting and terrible moments to go through ! D. hooked a salmon in a pool, and the creature seemed very strong and large, and after tugging more than half an hour he insisted upon going down the rapids. D. had on great wading-stockings and boots, and ran or stumbled through the water over rough round stones. At the foot of one rapid he nearly got the fish in, but the gaffmen were inexperienced, and made a dash at it, which frightened the salmon and sent him off down a second rapid ; then there was another long pause, another attempt on the part of the gaffmen, the hook came out of his mouth, and he was gone! However, we brought home seven salmon, and were all very happy, and very hungry for dinner at nine o'clock.

Branches were being planted all along the road, in honor of the Roman Catholic Archbishop's visit. He comes here once in five years. D. was able to present each of the priests with whom he was to stay with a salmon, which was very acceptable. The Comet, and a splendid Aurora, appeared for us to look at after dinner. In the night we start again.

Sunday, 12th.—We reached Chicoutimi this morning. We sent a note ashore inviting ourselves to breakfast with the Prices, and when we were dressed found Mr. Price waiting with his carriages to take us to the house. The Prices are a happy family of four girls and six sons, all unmarried, and all living together. We found their house charming. As you enter the gate you see through the trees the beautiful blue water, with large ships upon it; and the tide, when high, comes right up to the edge of the parapet. It is a delightful summer residence. They always have a large party in the house, and have lovely rides and drives, and boating excursions for their guests.

They gave us a good breakfast, which we ate ravenously, enjoying all the country fare, and the wild strawberries and cream! Afterwards we walked to a waterfall, and then returned to our steamer, and waited on board, while D. received an address. When we left we fired two guns as we passed the Prices' house, saluted with our flag, and exchanged pocket-handkerchief waves! The weather is fine, and we are enjoying our sail immensely.

Before we left Tadousac, an Indian came to D. and said that he wanted to go to the Marguerite, a little way up the Saguenay, and asked if he might go with us; D. told him to go on board the Druid with his canoe, and there we found him comfortably installed; but we passed the Marguerite and many other "stations," and at each he refused to get out; so it ended yesterday in our bringing him back again. We were much amused at the idea of his coming the trip with us, enjoying good fare, and returning home again. But when we came to examine him, it turned out to have been a misunderstanding: he wished to offer his services to D. as a fisherman, thinking he was going to the Marguerite, and once on board he was obliged to continue the voyage.

In the afternoon we passed under the cliffs "Trinity" and "Eternity," and went quite close to them. Trinity rises straight out of the water 1,500 feet high, a straight wall of rock. D. fired at the cliff, and we threw stones, without being able to hit it; it looks so much nearer than it is in reality.

We reached Tadousac at nine, and Archie was on the sands waiting for us, Terence awake in bed, and the others asleep and invisible.

Monday, 13th.—In the evening we went on board the Druid, hoping to sail; but there was a fog, which continued all night, and which kept us at anchor.

Tuesday, 14th.—We could not see our house when we first got up, but the mist cleared away suddenly, and we immediately prepared to start. Then there was great waving of handkerchiefs from the balcony to the steamer, and from the steamer to the family on shore. About two o'clock we reached Murray Bay, and went ashore to see this rival seaside place. We took a long drive in two carriages, D. and I leading the way, and the Fletchers and Lady Mary following. We had beautiful weather, and thought the place quite lovely. The ground seems to have been cut into terraces and mounds by the action of water, and there are the St. Lawrence, the Murray River, the mountains, and some very picturesque houses to make up the landscape. After driving for nearly three hours, we dined on board, and saw a beautiful aurora; and at twelve we started again, and found ourselves, on the morning of Wednesday, 15th, at St. Anne. We drove off early, in two gigs, to see some celebrated falls. The drive was nine miles, and we passed wood-carts almost by hundreds drawn by oxen and horses. The weather was fine but not clear, and we did not see the beautiful views to their best advantage. At the end of the drive we followed a woman who was to guide us to the Fall. She brought us up to a pretty little one, which we decided was scarcely worth all the trouble we had taken to see it; but, happily, I had been told a great deal about the St. Anne Fall, and felt sure this could not be the right one. We questioned the lady, and as she admitted that there were some "little" falls above, we determined to go on. The walk was tremendous—up such a hill, in the bush, and with pouring rain coming down upon us. However, we struggled on, and were rewarded by finding ourselves suddenly in front of the Falls. The water was rushing from a great height down a narrow gorge, forming six great steps or waterfalls, each one with a still pool at its base: so that there were six separate falls, and yet but one flow of water.

By the time we got back to our carriages we were very tired indeed, very wet, and very ready for our lunch, which we were to have in a cottage.

The yacht's cook's mother-in-law lived on the road, and he begged to be allowed to give us our lunch there. Nowell tells us that when he and the cook arrived they found the poor people busy with their summer cleaning; the man had two cans in his hand, and when the cook suddenly announced to him that the Governor-General was coming to lunch with him, he dropped both his cans, fell back into his chair, and shrieked “ Jamais ! ”

When we arrived, we found a flag at the gate, and one on the house, and the man and his wife—he not sixty, she seventy-two, and just married to him, en seconde noce—waiting to receive us.

The first room of the cottage was a big kitchen, with a good cooking-stove; and the room behind was also very large and very clean. In three corners were beds, surrounded by chintz curtains hung from the ceiling. There was a large stove, some chests for clothes, and a cupboard with glass door containing china. A table in the middle of the room was spread for lunch.

The old lady talked to me, and seemed much amused at our having so many people to wait upon us. The cook gave us an excellent meal, ending with wild strawberries, cream, and maple sugar ! We soon after said a warm farewell to our hosts, and drove back to the wharf. We ought to have seen a church at St. Anne celebrated for miracles performed there, and in which about one hundred lame people have left their crutches; but we had not time to visit it.

About eight in the evening we reached Quebec, and just as we landed the most awful shower I have ever seen came on, accompanied by thunder and lightning. The streets were literally flowing with water, and every spout was spurting forth little waterfalls.

CHAPTER XII.

ONTARIO AND THE LAKES.

Wednesday, 22d.—Our mail arrived at Quebec yesterday evening, and as soon as we had read our letters we embarked on board the Druid, and began our western tour. We arrived at Trois Rivières, and the Mayor came on board at eight o'clock this morning and took us ashore, where we found awaiting us a magnificent array of firemen, some in helmets and plumes, and some in full Zouave costume.

We drove to the Town Hall, a new and very large room for a town numbering only 9,000 inhabitants, and there we had an address in French, to which D. replied in the same language; then we went on to the Roman Catholic Cathedral, to a House of Providence, to the Ursuline Convent, and to the English Church, at the same time seeing the town, which is very pretty, with many grass corners, some fine trees, and a very pretty square. All this we accomplished by 9.30 o'clock, when we returned to our steamer, and a cannon announced that the Governor-General had gone. He soon after emerged from his cabin as an unofficial tourist, and we started in three carriages to see the Waterfall of the place; it was twenty-four miles off, and we had to be back at 7.30, so we had no time to lose. When we got to it, we found a very pretty fall, though not, I think, quite worth the journey. Close to it there is a curiosity in the shape of an enormous hotel, buried in the bush, like the palace of the belle au bois dormant, and into which no mortal guest has ever stepped—the produce of some incomprehensible speculation. We rowed six miles of the way back in a big, slow thing called a “scow,” got into our carriages, and returned to Trois Rivières.

There we were met by a number of young ladies and a pile of bouquets, and symptoms of an illumination, for which they hoped we would stay; but we had to be off early, in order to reach Montréal at a particular hour.

Thursday, 23d.—We traveled by train as far as Kingston, and thence by steamer.

Friday, 24th.—After a calm night on Lake Ontario, we landed at Toronto this morning. We had heard of guards of honor, etc., to meet us, but found only the hotel-keeper of the Queen's, who said our luggage was in our rooms (it had arrived by train the night before). He ushered us into carriages and drove us to his hotel, where we found very comfortable rooms arranged for us.

Colonel Cumberland, the provincial A. D. C., having made all arrangements for us, we did not even know where we were to go, but it now turns out that he had engaged rooms for us at the Rossin House; however, a friend of the Queen's telegraphed to the proprietor of that hotel, and he came to meet us, carried off our luggage, showed us into the Rossin House carriages, and drove to his own rival establishment. Our steamer was in an hour earlier than it was expected, and Colonel Cumberland was walking up and down his veranda waiting for the proper time, and so missed us.

D. received an address of welcome from the Town Council, and walked about to see the improvements in the town, and at five we had tea at the Lieutenant-Governor's.

Saturday, 25th.—Archie joined us. Directly after breakfast we drove to the railway-station, accompanied by a guard of honor, and there we found a very smart pilot-engine, ornamented with flowers and branches and flags; a second one, equally gay; then a sort of open carriage, with a canvas awning, with red pillars, and green boughs twisted about, and bouquets in the lamp-stands; next this we had a very comfortable ordinary railway carriage, with chairs and sofas, but when we passed stations we went into the open one, and smiled sweetly.

The first place we stopped at was called Newmarket; here we got out, and, mounting a stand, received two addresses. Then we got into carriages, and drove through the town, passing under four or five triumphal arches, to lay the foundation stone of a church.

All the country had come into the town, and almost every house had decorations and people in the windows. D. laid the stone, upon which “Straight forward” was engraved, was given a silver trowel, and drove back to the train.

The next ceremony was lunch at Allendale, in a very fine station on the borders of Lake Simcoe. It is the junction for Barrie, of which it has a lovely view; we went on there in the train, and passed under a fine arch close to the station at Barrie, to receive addresses from the corporation, and one from the clergy of all denominations in the place. There was a great crowd, and all the people we have seen to-day seem well-to-do; so well-dressed, and flourishing-looking.

Here we left our smart train, and got into a “special” steamer, in which we had the most delightful voyage across Lake Simcoe; the air delicious, and the scenery beautiful; green, clear water, and wooded islands, and a very distant shore. The day warm, but this traveling was perfection.

About five we came to a very curious place, called the Narrows, where the steamer passes under two bridges, and through a grass cutting; having only a foot to spare on each side, it is necessary to go very fast so as to be able to steer. Just before we got here four steamers decorated with flags and filled with people came out to meet us, and D. and I stood out on the bows and bowed, and the people waved their handkerchiefs and cheered; then we went in procession through the Narrows. Soon we came in sight of the hotel at which we are now staying; it is built on a promontory, and is a sort of garden in the bush; the grounds are laid out with grass, flowers, fountains, and with summer-houses hanging over the water. Having got through the Narrows, we are now in Lake Couchiching, and this is the Couchiching Hotel. We passed it, however, for the moment, and went on to Orillia. Some Indians in canoes came out to meet us; their flags were larger than their boats, and one man kept making furious gesticulations of welcome with a drawn saber.

Orillia gave us a great welcome; there were four or five arches—immense erections—one of them rather different from the ordinary pattern; it was castellated, and was ornamented with wheat, and with the animals of the country, stuffed—a deer on the top, birds, foxes, etc., in various recesses. Then there were all sorts of mottoes and good wishes, and the name of “Killyleagh” appeared, having been inspired by an old shopman from Belfast.

This place is on the edge of the settled country, and on the outskirts of the grant now set apart for emigrants. It is most flourishing. We drove through the town, and received two addresses on a stand in the middle of a sort of common. Then we returned to the steamer, and made our way to the hotel.

We dined privately, and afterwards were ceremoniously presented to all the people in the house; we then "repaired" to the larger dining-room, where there was dancing. We also had fireworks, and a band playing till eleven o'clock, when at last we went gladly to bed.

Sunday, 26th.—We went by steamer to church at Orillia. Towards the end of the Litany the poor old clergyman fainted; another clergyman finished the prayers, and we left.

D. went to see the Rector, and found that he was dreadfully disappointed that the sermon he had prepared had not been read; so we are going to ask for a copy of it. It seems he had been ill all night, and the doctor fears apoplexy.

Monday, 27th.—D. went out fishing before breakfast, and brought home some pretty but uneatable sun-fish. Fred had been miserable since we arrived, his portmanteau, containing everything he possesses, having disappeared, and he has been dressed in borrowed plumes; but last night it was found in the hotel. The young ladies in a body congratulated him, and he had to make them a speech.

There was a little regatta this morning, and an Indian canoe-race; I gave the winners of this last their prizes, and afterwards we started in our small steamer up Lake Couchiching.

The first place we stopped at was an Indian reserve called Rama. They had put up a platform and flags, and they fired off guns, and the chief and his "young men" met us on the wharf, and when we got on the dais they all stood round. The Wesleyan missionary read an address, to which D. replied that he was glad to hear that his children were content, and that it was the intention and endeavor of the Government to keep faith in every particular with the Indian subjects, in whom their great Mother, the Queen, took also a special interest, etc. Then he presented the chief, Benson, with a History of the Holy Land, illustrated, and we looked at the babies, who were being carried about on a novel sort of cradle. It is a flat board, on which the child lies; at the top of it there is a skeleton hood, which can be thrown back in the house, while out of doors it is raised, and has generally a shawl thrown over it. It is a most convenient cradle, as it can be set up against a wall, or hung up on a nail, or in a tree, the child being quite safely tied into it. It also goes flat against the mother's back as she walks along.

We looked at the plain little church, and went into one of the houses and distributed pipes and beads, and then said good-by. They sang "God save the Queen" in Indian. These are the Ojibbeway Indians. The missionary, his wife, and two nice children came with us to the next place—Washago.

This is only a temporary railway-station, but there was lunch in a car, an address, a guard of honor, and a foundation stone of a church to be laid. After this we got into carriages to drive fourteen miles. We stopped twice on the way—at Severn and at Gravenhurst—and received addresses. At each place where this occurs D. makes a speech, instead of reading a formal reply. When we left our carriages we got on to a steamer covered with flags, and steamed along a lovely place, called Muskoka Bay, into Muskoka Lake, and then through a most curious, narrow river, in which we twisted and turned round islands, and had only just room to move; sometimes we appeared to be going straight ashore, and then turned suddenly to one side and were saved. This river brought us to Bracebridge.

Bracebridge is an entirely new town, on the border of the New Muskoka Grant. It has grown wonderfully, considering that eight years ago the white man had not set his foot there. A band and a crowd met us on the wharf, and we drove through the town, the band preceding us, the Governor-General's carriage in front, and mine behind. I think we passed under seven or eight arches before we came to the daïs erected for the ceremony of presenting the address. The houses here are remarkably neat and finished-looking, and the population is almost entirely English.

When we returned to the steamer I had an interview with a very charming emigrant. I was very much interested in her, and in her husband's history and their present life. He was valet, and she was lady's-maid, with Sir William and Lady Anna Stirling-Maxwell; they married, and made up their minds to come here. Of course, neither he nor she knew anything in the world about farming; but they took the grant of 200 acres of uncleared land (in fact, of forest), and set-to to make a home. They have been here five years, and have two fine boys, and she was so merry, and so happy and courageous. They do everything for themselves, and are getting on well. Their land is good, and, if only the railway comes to it, Bracebridge will become an important town.

Tuesday, 28th.—We slept on board, and started at six this morning, sailing through Lakes Rousseau and Joseph. As we passed through the lock between the two, D. stepped ashore to speak to the few men there, and was followed in great haste by his A. D. C. and two reporters. His visit was quite unexpected, but one of the men made him a very good speech, though he trembled so over it that he could scarcely stand.

I can't attempt to describe the delightful traveling on these lovely lakes, or to tell you particulars of the scenery, and I have so many facts to put down that I have no time for details.

We stopped at Rousseau, where we visited the church, and a poor Icelandic family, and landed at the Summit House, where we got into carriages. The drive was seventeen miles long, and was right through the free grants, where any man coming out and wishing to take up a farm, receives 200 acres of forest free. As we drove along we saw settlers in all stages of their existence.

First we went into a neat cottage, where we found a County Down man; he seemed delicate. All his sons had set up for themselves, and I think the work was too much for him alone.

Then we saw a Parisian jeweler—the merriest man! He was turned into a hard-working farmer, and sees everything in couleur de rose. He had two very nice boys. Again, we saw a Canadian and an Enniskillen man living opposite each other, and both very happy and content. They all say the land is good, though there is much rock in parts of it. The finest family we saw was that of an old soldier from Meath. He and his wife had nine children, all beautifully dressed in white frocks with sashes, and, in the house, one wall was covered with books. The man was loud in his praises of the country, and would advise everybody to come here. The whole of this line of road is much more thickly settled than we expected; it is through a fine forest, and no part of it is far from a lake.

Finally, we arrived at Parry Sound, where we had addresses and arches, and a "sail" in a steam-tug; then we went on board the Chicora, our new home for a fortnight.

She is a very large steamer, and was formerly a celebrated blockade-runner known as the Letter B. Now she has stories of cabins built on her deck. We have her all to ourselves. This was Archie's birthday, so he dined with us.

Wednesday, 29th.—We left Parry Sound early in the morning, and about twelve o'clock found ourselves off Collingwood.

Nine steamers came out to meet us, with flags and passengers. They turned, and followed us to the town. There we had addresses, and arches, and a drive. Two little girls dressed as "Britannia" and "Canada" stood at the corners of the principal arch.

When we left, the steamers followed us out for some way, and there was a great farewell, with cheering and shrieking of engines, as we parted company.

Our next destination was Owen Sound. The addresses and arches you may imagine. The feature of the visit was a drive. I found myself behind four horses and postilions, an outrider in uniform in front of us, and about forty vehicles following us. We drove through the town and under the arches, and out to a waterfall. The country is very beautiful; the finest trees we have seen in Canada, and everything more park-like than is common here.

We returned on board for dinner, and during that meal went on to Presqu'ile, where there was a magnificent bonfire and a string of lamps. While taking in wood we walked to the bonfire, and were given a letter and a jar of honey.

Thursday, 30th.—We went into Killarney (the Indian name of this place signifies "here is a channel"), and sailed up a very narrow passage to reach it. The Indians were collected on the wharf, and fired a salute. One of them made a speech to His Ex., stopping at the end of each sentence to have it translated into English; D.'s reply went through the same process. We also spoke to the women and looked at the church, and distributed knives, pipes, tobacco, and beads. There was one funny old man with a drum, who took to dancing and singing before us.

At one o'clock we came to another Indian settlement—Manitoulin. The Indians here seemed very poor, and the one who made the speech spoke much to this effect: "We are glad to see you; our wives and our children are glad to see you, our father. We have come far to see you, and have brought our wives and our children to see you; and we are hungry, for we have had nothing to eat." D. ordered them a barrel of flour and a hundred-weight of pork. When he replies to the Indians, they give a deep grunt at the end of each of his sentences, which has a most peculiar effect.

They sometimes give me presents of their work, which I immediately pay for. At this last place there are Episcopalian and Wesleyan missionaries; and at Killarney we saw a Roman Catholic priest, who came in our steamer, greet his flock in a very affectionate manner.

The evening was a little rough, but we stopped at Bruce's Mines for the night.

Friday, 31st.—At six in the morning we went ashore to see the copper-mines, which are not flourishing, though the ground appears to be covered with the mineral, and we picked up a great many specimens.

On our way to Sault Ste. Marie we passed through a very beautiful and curious place called the Devil's Gap. There are a number of islands, so close together that it is impossible to see the way between them till you come straight opposite the channel, and then the view down each passage is very pretty. The one we passed through seemed only just large enough to hold our great steamer.

We stopped a few minutes at Garden River, where there was an Indian settlement, and a fine-looking chief, who danced for us. Then we reached Sault Ste. Marie, where we found an arch and an address, and went some way in a boat to lay the stone of an Indian school, and had lunch in the carpenter's shop, which the ladies had ornamented and made very smart.

Archie was very ill all day, and frightened us in the afternoon. Luckily we found very a good doctor here, who has kindly promised to come on with us in the steamer.

Sunday, August 2d.—We arrived at the mouth of the Nipigon River this morning, and went a little way up it in boats to see a Hudson's Bay settlement.

The gentlemen visited a store there, and came home dressed in white blanket-coats and red caps, looking very picturesque. At the Fort we saw a number of most miserable Indians, who sat huddled together, and who were dressing their children's hair much after the manner of the monkeys in the Zoo. These are the lowest class of Indians we have seen.

In the afternoon we found ourselves off Michipicoten Island, which is supposed to be very rich in agates; but all those on the surface have been already picked up, and we only saw a few small specimens. The old gentleman who keeps the Lighthouse gave me a good one, and also presented us with three splendid trout.

Monday, 3d.—Our next stopping-place was Nipigon. We passed through some very pretty scenery in coming to it—high rocks and curious-shaped hills—and anchored at a little Hudson's Bay settlement at the mouth of the river, where our first business, in the morning, was to rush to the store and make purchases for our fishing and camping-out expedition—knives, blankets, tin plates, mugs, looking-glasses, flies, etc. There were a good many Indians sitting about, and D. did the portrait of one girl, who giggled tremendously over it. The next thing was to pack our canoes. We had five. Ours was painted white, with Union Jacks on the bows; and into it got D. and I, the Fletchers, Archie, four men, and all our blankets, luggage, and tents. The second held the Freds, Dr. King (who is looking after Archie), Captain Wilson (our guide), Mr. Dixon (Archie's tutor), and four men, with a good deal of their luggage. There were three more canoes with baggage.

Our journey was a good specimen of the canoe and "portage" journeys one reads about.

Whenever we came to rapids we landed, and walked to the head of them, the canoes and all the things being carried by the boatmen. We had one portage soon after we left Chicora, and when we again got into our canoes we passed through a widening of the river which made quite a respectable lake. We came to a peninsula, with a rapid rushing past it, which we thought might be our camping-place; so we got out, and I began to fish, and very soon landed a good trout with my four-ounce rod. When the rest of the party came up, they told us that this was not our destination, so we had to cross the rapid and portage again. We did not quite like this camping-ground; it was on the banks of a small arm of the Nipigon, and we thought it damp, so, although we ate our dinner there, we pitched our tents on the top of the hill. The night was cold, and a heavy dew fell.

D. and I have an "American officers' tent," which is a most comfortable one, and Archie was allowed to have a corner in it. Colonel Fletcher has a funny little tent, which comes out of his carpet-bag, and which holds him and Lady Harriet. All the other gentlemen sleep in one large marquee; and the men have three more tents.

Tuesday, 4th.—We got up early, as we had a portage to make at once; and after a cup of coffee we set out. All the gentlemen had to carry things, and stumbled along with loads of blankets on their backs.

When we got to the end of this rather long portage, we had breakfast, and started off again. The day was very hot, and I felt the sun rather, and was not very well; but I managed to get along with the others. We paddled through some lovely places, and saw some beautiful rapids, and had three more portages. At the end of one we found a party of Americans—three doctors—who seemed very nice people. Straight opposite them, across the river, was another camp of Americans, with a lady in it. At the site of our permanent camp three branches of a very pretty rapid met, and swept down the river together. Here I stood out upon a rock and fished. On one side of me D. was lashing the water; then Fred Ward, barefooted, in the middle of the stream; then Archie, with (tell it not in Gath!) a spoon at the end of his rod (poaching, in fact); then Fred and the Doctor also fishing. None of us made great bags, as the fish (of which there are quantities) were perfectly gorged with shad-flies, and had no room for our delicate baits. Those we did catch were about two pounds weight. The cook, who carries about iron bars and sets up a fireplace wherever we go, provided us with an excellent dinner, and we sat round a bonfire till bedtime.

As this was our permanent camp, we made ourselves very comfortable. The whole floor of the tent was spread with fir-boughs, which are laid down most carefully and scientifically by the men, and make a most delightful carpet and spring mattress.

Wednesday, 5th.—Alas! it rains. Lady Harriet and I spent the greater part of the day in my tent; and D., Colonel Fletcher, Fred Ward, the Doctor, and Captain Wilson, went off to see Lake Nipigon, which is about sixty miles long. In the evening we fished again, and the Lake party came home in time to try their luck—which was small.

Thursday, 6th.—To-day we de-camped. We began with a portage, and arrived at the beginning of another long one just before lunch. You have never seen such appetites as we all had! We were ravenous, and cleared every plate. Thus strengthened we started again, everybody carrying something, and some of the gentlemen with great loads on their backs.

When we got to the end of the portage we had to wait some time, as the men having to carry over the canoes had to make two journeys of it. When we got into the canoes we ran some very exciting rapids. We camped at the “Alexander Camp,” which I have told you of before—a charming spot, but the fishing no better than at the other places. I wish, however, that you could see Archie catch a trout; the instant he gets it ashore he hugs it in his arms, and seems to think that the danger of losing it only begins on land. - His coat suffered greatly in these struggles. D. and I each caught one trout, and then we dined, roasted ourselves at the camp-fire, and slept.

Friday, 7th.—Off we are again, tents and baggage, and pots and pans, packed for their last trip in the canoe.

We had a pleasant voyage down to the Chicora, and found her beautifully ornamented for our reception, a triumphal arch at the top of the companion, and green wreaths over all the doors and hanging from the chandeliers. We lunched, devoted an hour to a tremendous wash after four nights of camping-out, and, arrayed in a little extra finery as a reaction, went to call upon Mrs. Crauford, a lady who had sent us a jar of most delicious fresh butter.

It is six o'clock, and we have just sailed away; and the ever-rough surface of Lake Superior lies before us.

D. has been doing several portraits of Indians. The translations of their names are curious, and we made the acquaintance of a "Naughty little Woman," of "She who cries with Joy," and of "The Cloud that is past."

Saturday, 8th.—There was a fog on the Lake, so we remained at the entrance to it all night, but got off early in the morning, and arrived at Silver Islet in four or five hours, having to pass through a disagreeable swell on our way there. The island itself is a mere rock, originally seventy by eighty feet; but it has been artificially increased fifty-seven times that size by breakwaters and docks built all round it. A Canadian company first began to work the mines, but, getting into difficulties, they sold them to an American company, who are now making a great deal of money. There is great expense in keeping out the water, as the "Islet" only just rises above the level of the Lake. We went over from the mainland in a tug, and saw all that could be seen without actually going down the mine. The silver is in fern-like patterns in a sort of white quartz. The "Captain" of the undertaking is a "Frew" from County Down, and talks of going home this year to put up a monument to his mother in Bangor Churchyard.

You see, we are constantly meeting successful people from that renowned county!

We proceeded on our journey, and passing Thunder Cape—high basaltic rocks, in places very precipitous, a fine piece of scenery—got into Thunder Bay. We landed at Prince Arthur's Landing, and received an address under a very hot sun. This is quite a new town—four years old; it looked very pretty, every house being decorated with green, and a quantity of flags about. It expects to become a great city. D. went out for a drive; but as I always shirk four strange horses when I can, I returned to the steamer.

We asked some gentlemen to dinner, and we sat on the deck and looked at the fireworks on shore. The young men went to a dance, and enjoyed themselves very much.

Sunday, 9th.—We went to church in the morning, and afterwards to Fort William, a Hudson's Bay settlement, where we lunched with Mr. Macintyre, his wife, and their nice daughter. It came on to thunder and rain heavily later, and we were glad to get back to the Chi-cora in a tug.

Monday, 10th.—We had to start at five o'clock in the morning, having seventy miles to drive. Some of us were in a sort of char à banc, drawn by four horses, which we changed four times en route, and the rest of the party were in smaller carriages. We got safely to Shebandowan, where we found about 120 Indians, who had all come down from the woods to be paid their annual stipend.

They were more savage than those we have seen before, and, though most of them wore European clothes, they had some symptoms of the wild man about them. They are pagans; and there were two medicine-men, who sat on the ground, and drummed, or "tom-tom'd," and sang in a dreary, monotonous tone, winding up each song with a discordant yell. One of them was painted green and yellow, and each wore a band round his head. Their profiles were handsome, but their full faces hideous. The interpreter was bad, so D. was not able to say very much to them; but he presented them with tobacco, pipes, knives, pork, and flour, which they probably preferred to conversation. We went into a wigwam made of birch-bark, which looked wonderfully roomy and clean inside.

We then got into a large canoe, and were tugged about the Shebandowan Lake, a very pleasant and cool way of moving about, compared to the carriage. We did not get back to the sleeping-place, which we had passed on our way here, till after nine; so we dined at once, and went early to bed. We slept in a cottage, and the Fletchers in a tent.

Tuesday, 11th.—We were again called at five, and found a wet morning—such a wet morning! However, we breakfasted, and, hoping for the best, drove in our shaky wagon for five miles to the borders of the Kamanistiqwa River, where we got into canoes to paddle sixty miles. I may say here that the river is evidently lovely, and had the day been fine we should have enjoyed it immensely; but the weather was perfectly awful, a thunder-shower lasting till one o'clock, which wetted us to the skin long before that hour.

During this downpour we had to get out of the canoes eight times to make portages, and you may imagine how miserable we were walking through narrow paths in dripping woods, our clothes heavy with rain! The worst bit of walk led to a magnificent waterfall, which was well worth seeing, even though we had to stumble over roots and trunks of trees, and in and out of pools of water, to get to it. It is 120 feet high, and very grand.

At one we lunched, and the rain ceased; we lit a fire, and dried our cloaks, but of course could do nothing to our boots or underclothing. A dish of hot potatoes brightened us up, and we got on pretty well till 7.30 P. M., when we reached a place where a steamer was to meet us. We had been looking forward with longing to this happy termination of our troubles; but when we got there, we found that the steamer had given us up, and had left ten minutes before! We were in despair at the idea of a further ten miles' paddle, but the canoe-men bore it with great good-humor, and immediately started off to race, by way of enlivening the time, and it was very pretty to see our five canoes shooting through the water. Our patience was rewarded, and our misery was soon changed into joy, for some wise friend sent the steamer back; and when we met her we were comforted by a cup of the best hot coffee I ever tasted.

We had promised to visit an Indian Mission on our way, and so we did; but the children there had all gone to bed when we arrived, and so we just peeped at their little dark heads as they lay asleep.

We reached the Chicora about nine, and took off our damp things at once. I was rather ill in the night, but none of us caught cold or were really hurt by the wetting.

Thursday, 13th.—We reached Sault Ste. Marie early this morning, having made a quick passage from Thunder Bay across the terrible lake. Captain Wilson, before giving up his post as guide, took us down the rapids here, which are very long and exciting; and then we bade farewell to him and to the Doctor. We have liked them both very much, and they have been a great addition to our party, so we were sorry to say good-by. Dr. King is an Englishman, but has joined the United States Army.

We had a very pretty sail down Lake Huron, and arrived at Mackinaw late in the evening, anchoring in a little harbor which only just held us.

Friday, 14th.—A delightful voyage down Lake Michigan.

Saturday, 15th.—This morning we came in sight of Chicago. A tug came off with our Consul (Mr. Warwick) in full uniform, who told us all the arrangements that have been made for our reception. The weather is beautiful.

We lunched early, and immediately after the Committee of Reception came on board. The President of the Committee is from County Down (Mr. Dickson), and his wife was a Miss Reid, and was at Killyleagh the day of our marriage. He is very happy here, and is pleased at being so well acquainted with us. Another member is from Killinchy (more County Down).

When D. had spoken to all the committee, we adjourned to the immense drawing-room of a gigantic hotel; there we were introduced to the Mayor, who made a speech, to which His Ex. replied; then to the President of the Board of Trade, to the Presidents of the St. George, St. Andrews, and the Caledonian Societies, who all mades peeches, which were all replied to; also to the Governor of the State; and I think there must have been more, but I can not remember them. Some unofficial introductions followed, and then we got into the first of sixty barouches to drive through the town. We saw the extent of the fire of 1871, and the wonderful way in which the city has risen from its ashes; also the effects of a second enormous fire last July: streets, churches, etc., all in ruins.

What I think is really beautiful here, is a drive by the shores of Lake Michigan: the water is a lovely, delicate blue-green color, there is no land in sight, the beach is charming, and the lake is covered with ships. This drive forms part of a very pretty park, in which there are small lakes, zoölogical gardens, etc., and lots of people about, in carriages, and boats, sitting, walking, and picnicking—the most Hyde Park-like thing I have seen on this continent.

We next visited the Waterworks, which are enormous.

We passed twice under the river through massive tunnels, and saw a number of very handsome new streets.

The Consul sent me some beautiful flowers and fruit.

I don't attempt much description of Chicago—a guide-book and statistics would be required. I can hardly believe I am here, and shall certainly not realize it until I see the celebrated pig-killing machines on Monday, of which one has always heard.

Mr. Dickson and his wife, the Consul and his sister, General Sheridan, and the President of the Board of Trade, dined with us on board, and at ten we drove to the hotel where we are to stay—the “Palmer House.”

It is a palace: marble staircases, broad passages handsomely carpeted, and furnished with crimson-satin sofas and chairs; chimney-pieces from Italy, in lofty rooms also beautifully furnished; pier glasses—every luxury, in fact. Each bedroom opens into a sitting-room, and off mine there is a bath-room with hot and cold water laid on. The bedroom has velvet-pile carpets with Aubusson patterns, plain crimson curtains, and chairs—such as I wish I had in my drawing-room at Clandeboye.

When we arrived we were presented to the manager, were seated in a comfortable room, and were “elevated” to our flat. The manager walked along and talked amicably to us. Pointing out the sitting-room he said, “This is the young gentlemen's room”; and then, laying hold of D.'s arm with both hands, added, “I don't know whether you are to be counted among them, my Lord.”

Sunday, 16th.—Such a breakfast! No wonder Americans despise our efforts in the way of hotels. Being out of the Dominion, we arranged to have our meals in the public rooms, so we went into breakfast in an enormous hall, and sat at a small table. There were two smaller rooms off it, filled with tables, and quantities of black waiters to attend upon the people, and a lengthy bill-of-fare to select from. I must say that everything was very good of its kind—tea, coffee, milk, eggs, and cookery, all of the very best, and it was amusing to see how it was all managed.

I went to a church which was in mourning for a bishop, and we had a curious sermon in his praise. His industry, his good manners, his beautiful French, the graceful way in which he could pay a compliment, etc., were all set before us with much gesticulation; but, in spite of all that was odd in the description of him, we received the impression of his having been a really good man. Everybody uses fans in church, and the singing was "done" by two men and two women.

The manager of the Hotel has placed the most magnificent flowers in my room, "with his compliments."

I have, you see, lost one of my prejudices already—that against the American hotel system; and I think their ladies dress well; they have quite the French knack of putting on things. We saw some girls in the Park with the commonest untrimmed harvest-hats, and they looked smart in them; black or gray is almost entirely worn, but the simplest materials are made up, and put on in a successful way.

At five o'clock we went into the Park for a little. All the German population were out, sitting on the grass, rowing in boats, eating their dinners, and spending the day there. A band played during the afternoon. There is the beginning of a collection of animals: two fine elk, a small lion, two grizzly bears, two buffaloes, etc.

The drive by the Lake was crowded with carriages.

Monday, 17th.—After breakfast we got the manager to take us over the Hotel. It is a great concern, and was a curious sight.

There are 200 women- and 125 men-servants, and 18 cooks.

Outside the kitchen is a carving-room, in which all the joints are on hot plates, with their own sauces in tins before them; vegetables also ready to be helped there. Regulations for the servants were written up on the wall; the first was, "No servant is ever to tell a guest there is none of anything until he has first been to say so to the manager."

A washing-up room came next, and then the enormous kitchen, in which were two large "kettle-drum" caldrons for soup, six broiling places, an oven for beef, one for mutton, another for veal, etc., etc., and places in the same way for each different vegetable. We were there between meals, and saw the chops, cutlets, and chickens being packed in tins ready for cooking; when ready they are slipped into an ice-cupboard in the kitchen till required.

The store-rooms are regular shops. We also visited the bake-room, where excellent bread is made; the pastry-room, laundry, larders; and finally we inspected the bedrooms. Even the top ones are smartly furnished, and there are eleven miles of good carpet down in the hotel.

One drawing-room is in the Egyptian style: green and crimson satin furniture, the chimney-piece and the corners of the chairs and sofas carved into black and gold Sphinxes. One bedroom is done in pink satin and black velvet, but every part of the house is most gorgeous. The bar-room is very large, and has ten or twelve billiard-tables in it. They gave us the most delicious lemonade there, and I was just enjoying it when a message came to say the "Board of Trade" (to which I had not intended to go) did expect me; so I had to get on my bonnet at once.

The Mayor, Governor, and other officials conducted us thither, and we met together in a small room at the Exchange, which was what D. expected; but what was our surprise at being taken from it into the enormous Exchange Room, and to find it crowded with people! D. and I were put upon a platform before them, and the President, knocking with a hammer for silence, said: "His Excellency the Governor-General of Canada will now address you." D., who was taken quite unawares, made them a very good speech. He had to speak at the top of his voice, for it was very noisy outside, and there was some telegraphing machine passing through the room, which kept up a constant racket; but he was heard, and what he said was very well received. The Governor of Illinois said a few words, and then the President asked any one who wished to be presented to pass by the "north" side of the platform, and we shook hands with all who came up.

We next adjourned to the Grand Pacific Hotel, where the Board of Trade gave us luncheon.

This is another palace, and I never saw an entertainment better done, or with more taste. A band was stationed in the passage, which played "God save the Queen," and other music. The lunch was cold, with the exception of hot turtle soup and coffee.

The table was T-shaped, and we sat at the top, having no one opposite us. A row of black waiters stood at the end of the room. They wore white aprons, black tail-coats, and white gloves, and looked so funny "at attention," their white paws crossed over their chests; when a signal was given, they all marched in to serve.

Again we got into our carriages, and drove to the Stock-yards. The machinery, into which a pig walks alive at one end, and comes out a ham at the other, had just stopped working, but it was fully explained to us. There were yards full of cows waiting to be sold.

I enjoyed the drive there, and if it had not been so very long, the drive home would have been delightful, and even in my state of fatigue it interested me much. I was so surprised to find nine miles of boulevards—that is, of broad carriage-drive, the edges beautifully finished off, trees planted on either side, parts of it park-like, and parts filled with flowers. Then there are beautiful villas and streets, in which each house has its own bit of lawn and garden. I had thought of Chicago only as a money-making place, and did not expect to find so much spent on beautifying. I am delighted with it—the place.

I had an hour's rest after my return, and then dressed to receive any people who might come to see us. The manager sent Lady Harriet and me beautiful bouquets for the occasion, and when we went into his drawing-room the flowers were a beautiful sight. One table was covered with bouquets, which were afterwards presented to each lady as she came in; the chimney-pieces, etc., all over flowers.

A number of people came, another Killyleagh man among them, Murdoch by name: he only left ten years ago, and has "seen nothing equal to it" (Killyleagh) since. He took to printing, about which he knew nothing, and seems to be flourishing.

Tuesday, 18th.—D. and the other gentlemen drove off early to see the "Prairie," and Lady Harriet and I went an expedition with the Consul's sister-in-law over the shops of the town.

The first we did was Field & Lighter, where a most amiable man showed us everything from top to bottom. It is a very large general shop. Gloves are 10s. a pair; a muslin dress, very much trimmed with imitation lace, £30; and the making of a plain dress, £6, which is not cheap.

Then we went to a china-shop (all came from England), and to a toy-shop, where I made a few purchases for my family. We also were shown a confectioner's, or "candy-shop," and we saw the picture painted in England, and sent by the "Graphic" as a memorial of the Chicago fire.

Another sight was very curious. People here often keep their own money, instead of putting it into banks, and we visited the safes. There are small rooms, the walls of which are lined with pigeon-holes, each having a very strong door and lock of its own. Persons hire these boxes, have their own keys, and sometimes go twenty or thirty times a day to use their money. Ladies also hire these safes for jewelry. The outside door weighs five tons.

D. enjoyed his visit to the Prairie, or "Perairer," as they call it here. He shot one "chicken"—a prairie fowl; the others nothing; but they were only there a short time, and they saw the country, which was what they wanted.

On their return we dined, and prepared for our departure. The hotel-keeper again presented us with bouquets and enormous baskets of splendid fruit. Mr. Murdoch came to say good-by to his Killyleagh friends.

We traveled all night in a Pullman car, and slept very comfortably.

Wednesday, 19th.—We arrived at Detroit this morning, which seems to be a very pretty town. D., Fred Ward, and Colonel Fletcher went by steamer to Windsor and Chatham, but as they had to return here I gave up the expedition. At both places D. had very warm receptions, and Colonel Fletcher tells me he made excellent speeches.

Lady Harriet, Fred, and I, walked about to look in at shop-windows, and at five o'clock we crossed the river in a steamer to meet D. at Windsor.

We all returned together, and were magnificently "received" at Detroit. The steamer stopped at the foot of a fine, very wide street going straight up the town; it was crowded with people, flags flying from most of the houses; there were companies of United States troops, fire-engines, police, a military band in the streets, and people sitting in all the windows. We drove in procession through a great part of the town, D. going first with the Mayor, Mr. Moffatt. Detroit is very pretty: the streets are planted with double rows of trees; there are squares, a fine Town-Hall, and gardens round all the dwelling-houses. At one place the procession reached completely round the square, the head and the tail of it meeting and passing each other. We returned to the Town-Hall, and there we heard a speech of welcome from the "Orator" of the town, and D. made a very good reply. Two other speeches followed, all expressing the warmest friendship to England and Canada. The Town-Hall was illuminated. After dinner some singers came and serenaded us.

Thursday, 20th.—This morning, at 8.30, we left Detroit, and getting on board a most comfortable little steamer, went down the St. Clair River to Sarnia.

Mr. Mackenzie, the Prime Minister, who comes from Sarnia, was with us, and we had a pleasant journey through lovely scenery, and in beautiful weather.

Mr. Mackenzie was evidently very anxious that Sarnia should distinguish itself, and looked very much pleased when four steamers, crammed with people, and covered with flags and green boughs, came out to meet us.

The river here joins Lake Huron, and is at this point very narrow, Fort Huron, an American town, being straight opposite.

When we arrived at the wharf we found a pink-and-white pavilion erected, ornamented with festoons of red, white, and blue; and close by it, on the one side, a very large stand, upon which hundreds of people were sitting; on the other side, two tents carpeted, and arranged for a reception. D. as usual replied to two addresses, and then no less than ten were read to him by chiefs of different Indian tribes, to which he replied in one speech. These Indians are more civilized and advanced than those we have seen lately, and speak with horror of the "disgusting" war-dance.

We went into the tents, and shook hands with every one who came by, and then we got into carriages to drive through the town. Sarnia (the ancient name of Guernsey) is a small place, but there was an immense crowd in it, people from the country, and a trainful from London being there.

The first arch we passed through had a picture of the Queen on one side, and one of D., by a native artist, on the other. As we passed under the second, a large cheese was lowered into the carriage, as a present. At one house a little stand was erected in the garden, covered with children, who cheered and waved flags. All through the town we received the warmest welcome.

After the drive we came a couple of miles in the steamer to the railway-station, over which some very comfortable bedrooms were arranged for us. We dined there, and some of the party went to an impromptu dance at Sarnia in the evening.

Friday, 21st.—We ventured on to Lake Huron this morning in a small steamer, and were punished for our temerity. The sofas and chairs danced about the cabin, the band rushed to the side, the reporters sat drooping upon the stairs, I lay on the floor, and we were all glad when at four o'clock we landed at Goderich. It is a very prettily-situated town, on a high bluff, and after an address we immediately drove round it, and to the house of our host, Mr. Cameron; and about five o'clock, somewhat giddy, and not at all hungry, we sat down to a great luncheon. When it was over, we again took to our carriages, and drove to the Town-Hall. It is built in the center of the Square, and every street in the town leads to it. Here we held a sort of reception, people passing by and shaking hands. Then we went on to see some salt-works.

In searching for oil, they found salt, and salt of the best quality. Salt water is pumped up into shallow iron tanks, which are heated, so that the water evaporates, and leaves the whitest, most sparkling salt. Of course we had, before leaving these works, to stand over glasses of champagne, and D. made a very successful speech to the guests assembled there. Back again to our house. Dress instantly for dinner, and for the ball which comes after. Dinner is my greatest trial on these occasions, for I really can't be hungry so often in the day.

After it we went to the ball. The Curling Rink was arranged for the occasion, and was very pretty, and there were numbers of nice-looking girls. I left before supper, D. directly after, and the boys some time in the morning. On our way to the ball we saw some fireworks and a candle illumination in the town.

Saturday, 22d.—We had to breakfast at eight, and leaving our kind hosts, Mr. and Mrs. Cameron, go on our way. An hour after starting we stopped for "five minutes" at the railway-station of Mitchell, and heard and answered an address.

The next stopping-place was Stratford, which town was promised "two hours." Here there was a guard and a band and crowds of people, two addresses, and a drive sedately round the town with four horses, and a large following of carriages. We went into an Episcopalian, a Roman Catholic, a Presbyterian, and a Wesleyan Church, so that no one might be jealous; and when we returned to the station an address was presented by some Germans. We looked into a refreshment-room, and left everybody else at lunch when we again got into our train.

In a short time we reached Berlin, a German settlement. We were met by the usual number of carriages, and by some horsemen wearing red, white, and blue sashes, who preceded us into the town, with a band playing. All the houses were decorated, and all the inhabitants were out. The address was presented under an awning in front of the Town-Hall, and D. spoke so as to make himself heard by a large part of the crowd. I think it was a very successful visit. A German glee club sang "Die Wacht am Rhein" to us.

Guelph was our last station, and resting-place for the Sunday. Guard of honor, band, two addresses, lunch in Town-Hall (four o'clock), our healths drunk. D. went for a drive, and I came up to Mr. Leman's house, where we stay. In the evening we drove to the Town-Hall to see the illuminations, and to hold a full-dress sort of Drawing-room, which went off very well. On our return we had supper; and this time we were really very hungry, for we made mistakes about the hours to-day, and did not eat when we might, and then could not when we would. I have a most charming bedroom here, everything so pretty and nice. The hostess is very lively and pleasant, but, not being very well at present, her mother does the honors.

Sunday, 23d.—We went to a large, new, and rather pretty church. You can't think how we bless the Sunday!

Monday, 24th.—We breakfasted early, as D. had to be out at nine to drive over a model farm, and see some other Guelph sights. I remained quiet until eleven o'clock, when I joined him at the railway-station. We had only a short distance to go, but stopped three times on the way.

We first arrived at Preston, a German settlement, and heard an address read with great emphasis, and D. was presented with a native suit of clothes. Galt came next, and our object here was to visit Miss Macpherson's Home.* She brings waifs and strays out to Canada, and gets them adopted by farmers or placed as servants.

There was an address at the station, after which we drove off with Miss Macpherson to her Home. The children were all at the door, and looked very well and healthy. An old gentleman took us over his house to see a view he was very proud of, and then we got back to our train.

We visited Harrisburg, but were not expected till next day, so we only saw a few people. Brantford is our real stopping-place, and there we were met by guards of honor, both foot and horse, a band, and a very great crowd. We drove to a square, where the address was presented, and then to a school, where hundreds of children were arranged round the lawn. They sang, and the mistress read an address; but D. could not make much reply, as we had not known of this visit, and had only just time to carry out our programme. Half an hour was given us for lunch at the hotel. Our rooms are most comfortable, the people who generally live in them having furnished them for themselves, and having turned out for us.

Lunch over, we started on new duties. D. turned the first sod of a railway ; and I laid a stone of a young ladies' college now building, and His Ex. replied to the address presented to me in a speech about young ladies, which I recommend to all those whom it may concern. The Blind Asylum came next, but as all the pupils were away for their holidays, it was not very interesting. We got home an hour before dressing-time.

The weather to-day was lovely, and the whole of Brantford and the surrounding country had turned out in their best clothes ; the houses were gayly decorated, and there was an indefatigable band, which played the whole day and evening ; some arches were up, and everything went off successfully. D. from his speeches is daily becoming more known to the people, and they receive him better and better as we go on, and that is very pleasant.

The Mayor, Clergyman, President of the Senate, Captain of the Guard, etc., dined with us—a party of eighteen.

Tuesday, 25th.—You lazy people who amuse yourselves all day, can scarcely imagine how difficult it is to me to find five minutes to write in ; I seize two or three moments before our early breakfast, enough in which to scribble down dry facts, but I have to leave out many little things I might tell you if I were not so hurried, and which I long to have a record of myself.

We were in our carriages by nine o'clock, and, followed by forty-six other vehicles, started to visit the Indian Reserve—52,000 acres—on which the Six Nations live.

Outside the Reserve is the oldest Protestant church in Canada, called the Mohawk Church ; in it is a service of plate presented to the Mohawk Indians by Queen Anne. The tomb of the great Indian warrior, "Captain Brant," is in the churchyard. We had thirteen miles to drive, and at the entrance to the Reserve we found an arch—"The Six Nations' Welcome" on one side, and on the other, "The Six Nations are gratified; come again." There was another arch farther on, where we were met by Indian bands and Indian people; most of them in European clothes, but a few with feathers, etc. The interpreter is a very clever, fine-looking man, and he was beautifully dressed in well-made, tight-fitting tunic and breeches of deerskin, with silver ornaments; the sleeves were short, finished off with fringe, and over the rest of the arm there was a long gauntlet of wampum; a slouchy black felt hat finished off his costume. He looked very magnificent on horseback.

Close to the "Council House" was a third arch and a great crowd of Indians, among whom were a number of old warriors "got up" in paint, feathers, etc.; but these adornments are no longer natural to them, and are only put on in our honor. We waited in the Council Chamber—a good room, where several curiosities were laid out for inspection—and when all was ready we passed into an enormous arbor erected for the occasion, which was filled with Indians and other spectators.

We sat on a daïs, and listened to an Indian speech, which was translated to His Ex., who replied in English, stopping at the end of every sentence for the interpreter to put it into Indian. The words of the language are very long, and the Indian speech took twice as long to deliver as the English one.

When this was over, the old chiefs shook hands with us, and there was a great rush of women, many of whom presented me with things. One pinned a little silver brooch into my dress. She was a very handsome-looking person, and wore a large straw hat and a great cloak, underneath which one saw cloth gaiters, worked in beads.

The next ceremony was a war-dance. Seven men took part in it; but the shrieks which accompanied it were more curious than the dancing. The Indians then gave us a great luncheon and some excellent tea, and we were waited upon by most respectable native girls, who have been to school, and who are quite civilized.

[Here I was interrupted, and for three days it has been impossible to write a line, so busy have we been.]

After leaving the Indians we drove on to the farm of Mr. George Brown, editor of the "Globe,"* senator, great "champion" of the Grit party, and amateur farmer. His place—Bow Park—is so called because the river forms a bend there. He goes in for Shorthorns, and has 300 of them. I was amused to find that, with this number of cows, he has not sufficient milk to make butter for his own house, so "exigent" are the calves, who expect to have a wet-nurse as well as a mother, and who, being very precious, have to be humored and pampered in this way. They also go on being nursed till they are almost grown up. What surprised me was to see a second crop on nearly all his fields. That is his method: to cut the green food, and carry it to the cows, and so to get second crops from off the whole farm. When we had looked at each beautiful but expensive animal, we adjourned to a tent, and had dinner. Mr. Brown proposed His Ex.'s health very nicely. He was one of D.'s opponents during the Pacific Scandal, and he said: "There may have been a time when some of us may have differed with and found fault with the Governor-General's policy; but now that we have the means of understanding and knowing him better," etc., etc. Every one laughed, and enjoyed the allusion. The drive to Brantford brought us there at eight o'clock, and I had at once to dress for a reception at the Town-Hall, which went off very well. But you see that, as D. says, we "work our passage."

* The Globe newspaper of Toronto.

Wednesday, 26th.—Off at 9 A. M. as usual. We drove to Paris, where we were received by the Mayor and the people, and drove a mile and a half, at a foot's pace, to the railway-station.

The town is prettily situated, and it takes its name from the gypsum in its neighborhood, of which it makes plaster of Paris. The station was most beautifully decorated: at one end of a square was the platform, raised, carpeted, covered in with flags and hung with green garlands and bird-cages, and all the telegraph-posts down the railway-sides twined with green and joined with garlands. Addresses, of course, were read, and then we shook hands with numbers of people; among others, with a woman who came from Clandeboye a year ago, and who seemed almost mad with excitement at seeing us. She asked to kiss D.'s hand, but he said, "I could not allow a lady to kiss my hand." "Then may I kiss your face?" D. got out of this embarrassing position by saying, "Lady Dufferin does not allow that." Woodstock was our next destination. The address was at the station, and we drove out to the place of Mr. Alexander, a senator, where a great public picnic was given in our honor. D. had to reply to an address from the county, and to return thanks for his own and for my health, which were proposcd separately at lunch; mine by a farmer, who did it rather well, referring to William's speech on revisiting Holland, when he said that the welcome would have been greater if "Mary had been with me." We met here a Southern gentleman, Mr. Fearn, whom we had known eleven years ago in England; and the three pretty Misses Alexander.

Then on to Ingersoll, a small town, well and compactly built, where we drove through well-decorated streets, followed by guards, firemen, and people, to the School. Ingersoll is a great cheese-making place, and there was an arch made of cheeses, the motto on it being, "Cheese, the making of Canada." We drove out in procession to a cheese-factory, and saw the whole process of converting new milk into cheese in five hours. The Sunday milk has to be used for butter, as for the cheese-making it must be quite fresh.

We always feel glad when we approach our sleeping-town, and at 6.30 to-day we got to London. We had been here two years before, but the people gave us as warm a reception as if this had been our first visit.

It was almost dark when the address-ceremony was over, but the streets were crowded, and we were conducted by all the people to Major Walker's house. Over the gate was a beautiful, illuminated arch. I had a room furnished with the prettiest specimens of Canadian maple furniture I have ever seen. Mrs. Walker is a German, and very nice, and she gave us a quiet dinner, for which we were so thankful to her.

D. had to go out to a "concert," and found that he was expected to speak—for the ninth time to-day!

Thursday, 27th.—We were routed out directly after breakfast to go and open, and name, the "Victoria Park," and then we proceeded to the Town-Hall, where we held a reception and ate lunch. It was given by the town, and there were about one thousand people in the room. D.'s health was drunk, and he made a very good speech in reply, and we got off to the train by 1.30. In an hour we arrived at St. Thomas. I need not enter into all the usual reception business—arches, guards. We had a drive, and saw a wonderful wooden railway-bridge, and were taken to another railway-station, where we were introduced to heaps of people; and then, just as we were getting into our carriage, the Mayor, horror-stricken, exclaimed: "But the lunch! you must come and lunch." D. consented to run in for a moment, and got through three speeches. On the return to the carriages Colonel Fletcher says the Mayor was in despair—300 or 400 dollars' worth of lunch, and nobody to eat it. He had been there fifty-six years, and never received a Governor-General before, and said, "I know you will never come back." It was quite touching, and I really longed to eat some of the lunch.

Simcoe is a very pretty rural town, which we reached in an hour's time. It had made great preparations for us—no less than nine arches, and every house streaming with flags, and yards and yards of red and blue and white stuffs. The Court-House was very prettily arranged with a covered platform outside, where the address was read. We went to stay with Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, at their charming little country-house, out of which we had to turn after dinner to see fireworks and illuminations, and to be introduced to people on the aforesaid platform. In the night there was a real fire, caused, I fear, by these honors to us, and the Freds both worked hard till two in the night, carrying buckets, and helping to put out the flames. When D. next morning expressed his regrets that such an unfortunate accident should have occurred during his visit, the Mayor politely assured him that it was a very good thing and would greatly improve the town.

Friday, 28th.—We drove to Waterford, first visiting the schools at Simcoe. There, and at Dean's Corner and Welland, we stopped for addresses from the counties, and at four we got to St. Catherine's. It is near Niagara, and is celebrated for mineral waters. The town is very pretty, houses and trees being mixed everywhere.

The arches here were of new patterns. One represented a ship with the yards manned, and a large boat, filled with people, hung from the center of it. One was made of carriage-wheels, one of chairs; and across the street, in one place, a man was slung, apparently sitting in an umbrella. One flag had "Hamilton—Killyleagh Castle, County Down—For Ever" written on it. The prettiest arches to look at were some with mottoes in very large-headed tin nails on red cloth. The Royal Arms were also done in this way, and were quite lovely.

A platform was erected in the middle of the market-square, and D. spoke from it. Strings of green and flags were hanging from side to side on the street.

We drove slowly through the crowd to the Schools, and on to the hotel. Being very tired, I escaped a dinner that was given by the town; nor did I go to the fireworks, which were really beautiful. D.'s arms were done, and great bouquets of colored "candles" finished off the display. When he came back, I held a reception with him. Now I have had to write all this at once, so I have only given you the slightest account of all our doings and of all the kindness we meet with everywhere; but even the short-hand reporters have been unable to keep up with the descriptions they ought to write, so you must forgive me.

Saturday, 29th.—D. went to the Welland Canal Works, and Lady Harriet, Fred Ward, and I met him in the train a short way from St. Catherine's, where we went to see a great bridge which Colonel Gzowski has "thrown" across Niagara River.

I told you two years ago that we saw it being built. This time we crossed over it, and on our return stopped in the middle, and waited to see the way it opens to let ships pass. We stood on an immense piece of it resting on three piers; the two ends were detached by machinery, and we swung on the center pier straight up and down the river. It was beautiful to see how easily it worked, and curious to look at our train left standing at the edge of a precipice; then we swung back, and the rails and all joined together again. Opposite the Falls we got into carriages, and drove down to see them again. The second visit lifts Niagara in my estimation above all disappointment, and, after great experience in waterfalls, I can say that none approach it. We saw it in beautiful sunshine, with a perfect rainbow joining the Falls. When we had quickly admired them, we proceeded in our train to the town of Niagara, which is fourteen miles away.

Here we stopped at the door of Mr. Plumb, who is to be our host for a couple of nights, and, having had a cup of tea, went on to the Court-House, which we found prettily decorated, and where an address was read and presentations made.

Sunday, 30th.—We drove to church, and went into the Rectory afterwards to see Mrs. McMurray, who is a celebrity in her way. There is an account of her in a book called Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada, by Mrs. Jamieson. She is an Indian half-breed; her father was an Irish gentleman of good family, but she spoke nothing but Indian till she was fifteen. Dr. McMurray, a missionary, married her. She is now a very tall old lady, with a great deal of the Indian peeping out; but as she is proud of her nationality, that is as well.

We made a round on our way home, to drive through an oak park on the borders of Niagara River. The quiet of Mr. Plumb's place is delightful: it is a red brick villa, with a Mansard roof, and a large new dining-room just added on. He has three sons and three daughters at home. He himself is an M. P., American by birth, Canadian by adoption.

We see peaches and grapes ripening in the open air, and the weather and climate in summer are delightful in this part of the country.

Monday, 31st.—We left Niagara in a steamer, and crossed Lake Ontario in the most lovely weather.

The chief excitement of this trip was caused by my maid. She was rushing to the waiting-room to fetch a parcel, when the steamer went off without her, and she ran about the wharf gesticulating in the most excited manner. We put back for her, and got her on board on the verge of hysterics. I kept safely away until she had had time to calm down. We went to the Queen's Hotel at Toronto, and in the evening I took a walk in the streets with D. As we were walking along, a man looked over his shoulder, and said, "It is quite pleasant to see you going quietly like that," and then entered into conversation with us respecting our tour, and especially about our reception by the Americans.

D. and Fred went to a theatre after dinner, where D. was recognized, and received with cheers. The actors, who were in the midst of a tragic part, could not imagine what the noise was about.

Toronto: Tuesday, September 1st.—D. looked at a regatta, and lunched with a rifle-club. There he made a speech. I did nothing until the evening, when we dined with Mr. Howland. He has a nice house, and, although the dinner was rather long, it was very pleasant. There was a Southern general, with one leg and one arm, who sat by me, and told me his wife was the most distinguished woman in the South, as she had seven children under five years old—two pairs of twins among them.

Wednesday, 2d.—D. went again to the regatta, and to give away the medals won. In the evening he dined at the Club, and made (people say) an exceedingly good speech there. The hearers were quite enthusiastic, and besides continual cheers during the speech, they stood up and cheered for fully five minutes after he had finished.

In speaking of our tour, D. said: "Never has the head of any Government passed through a land so replete with contentment in the present, so pregnant of promise in the future. From the northern forest border lands, whose primeval recesses are being pierced and indented by the rough-and-ready cultivation of the free-grant settler, to the trim inclosure and wheat-laden townships that smile along the Lakes; from the orchards of Niagara to the hunting-grounds of Nipigon; in the wigwam of the Indian, in the homestead of the farmer, in the workshop of the artisan, in the office of his employer—everywhere have I learned that the people are satisfied: satisfied with their own individual prospects, and with the prospects of their country; satisfied with their Government, and with the institutions under which they prosper; satisfied to be the subjects of the Queen; satisfied to be members of the British Empire."

Thursday, 3d.—Hitherto we have been hot. To-day we were very cold. It rained a great deal, and we had our first experience of this sort of tour in wet weather.

When we began our journey again, Whitby was the first place we stopped at. Soldiers held a tarpaulin over our heads while the address and reply were being "got through," and an umbrella-covered crowd stood around us. Then we got into a carriage, and drove to a platform in front of the High School. The poor children had taken great pains with their decorations, and there were V. R.'s and D.'s in every pane, and garlands on the walls, and children in white standing out in the rain.

Next we went to a college about to be opened. An arch at the entrance was very prettily done. Children in pink, white, and blue stood all round the top of it, forming a lovely decoration—if only the sun had shone upon them! This college is called “Trafalgar Castle,” and the house was built as a private residence, but had to be sold. There was another address, and presentations in the drawing-room.

Bowmanville came next, but the rain poured so heavily there that we hurried through three addresses as quickly as possible.

At Port Hope the rain ceased. But as the carriages drove up here I conceived a dislike to the horses provided for us, and as we went jogging uncomfortably along I disliked them more, and D. made me get out and return to the station. In this way I missed seeing the town, which is very prettily situated, and also missed a sad and fatal accident which occurred. In the Fletchers' carriage, which was second, there were also some spirited horses. Of course there was a great noise, a crowd, bands, escort of cavalry, shouting, etc.; in fact, all the things which, combined with fatigue, have made me terribly nervous during our various processions through the towns.

The carriages stopped while a school sang “God save the Queen”; and just as they were going on, a poor woman rushed forward to look, and got between the first and second carriages. The horses could not be pulled in, and she was knocked down, and killed on the spot. I fear she has many children, but the Mayor has not yet sent us particulars.

At five o'clock we reached Coburg, and had an address—or two, I think—at the Town-Hall. A Drawing-room afterwards. The rest of the evening, wonderful to say, was unemployed. We are in a most comfortable hotel.

Friday, 4th.--We left the house at 8 A. M., and went by train for half an hour to Rice Lake, where we got into a steamer.

Rice Lake is very pretty indeed, and is so named because of the wild rice which grows there. We had one address on the way, as we passed through the lock at Hastings. The reeve there was a most amusing old man, and told us he had been waiting fifty years for a nobleman to come and see him.

The final object of our expedition was an iron-mine, and we had to go a short way in a train to reach it. I did not expect to care the least about it, we have seen so many untidy, stony, barren places called mines; but this one was really an interesting sight.

We found ourselves at the top of an enormous hole or cavern (these words are too small for it), 140 feet deep, and large in proportion, perfectly open, and light as day. The men looked like imps as they worked below, and it was a sort of thing one sees represented, in miniature, in a fairy play. The sides were walls of iron; but, alas! the coal is in the States.

When we returned to the steamer we found a barge tied to its side, covered in with green—a floating arbor—in which lunch was laid; and very glad we were of it, as we breakfasted at 7.30, and it was now past 2. The managers of the mines, steamers, etc., are Americans, and we were their guests. Colonel Chamblis and General Fitzhugh, with their wives (two sisters), were our hosts; they live in the hotel, and are charming Southerners.

There was great anxiety about the time of our return, as a banquet and a ball were to follow. From the beginning I had said I would not dine, and I withstood very severe sieges upon the subject; but I was glad I had refused when I found we did not reach Coburg till 7.30, after eleven hours' outing. We were met by a torchlight procession, and as my carriage was drawn by men, and not by wild horses, I enjoyed it. The firemen presented me with an enormous bouquet as I got out of the carriage.

All the other ladies had to rush home to dress, and Lady Harriet and I enjoyed a quiet tea.

We went down to look at the dinner-table, which was beautifully arranged (in the hotel). It was shaped to represent the deck of a yacht, and two pillars which supported the ceiling of the room acted as masts, the rigging being properly arranged from them. There was a tiller and a bowsprit—in fact, the idea was completely carried out, and in front of D. stood a cake, on which was inscribed the word "Foam."*

D.'s health was drunk, and the company were delighted with his reply, which brought all the guests to their feet. The dance was in the same room, and was very pretty and successful. I was at it for a short time.

Saturday, 5th.—At our posts again at 9 A. M. A tender farewell to Coburg, and a warm "How do you do?" to Belleville.

The station was three quarters of a mile from the town, and we had a slow march all that way, and all through the town to the place where the addresses were read. Then out to a great institution for the deaf and dumb. The building is on a fine site, and is most airy and cheerful. The pupils were collected in a large room, and on the wall, in green letters, was written, "Accept our silent welcome." Dr. Palmer, the head of the institution, brought forward some untaught children just arrived, and showed us how he began to teach them so as to give them their first ideas. It was very interesting to see their expressions of dawning comprehension. Dr. Palmer then showed us other children in various stages. One little girl, who had just returned from the holidays, having got a little rusty during her absence, made the most curious faces of disgust with herself when she made a mistake, and the most piteous sort of sound between a laugh and a cry.

A deaf-and-dumb teacher next came forward to show us the sign-language, and in pantomime told us a story ; it was a wonderful piece of acting. He afterwards (in the same way) told the story of Christ stilling the storm ; and I don't think that the reading of the passage could be more impressive than the way in which he conveyed the narrative to us by signs. I thought, when he began, that, coming after the comic story, it might seem irreverent ; but it had a most solemn and reverential effect. D.'s speech was interpreted into signs as he spoke it, so we saw the method well. No word is spelled ; every sentence is in signs. They all "did" "God save the Queen" in this way before we left.

This interesting entertainment made us unpunctual for the first time during our tour, and we had to run in and out of Miss Macpherson's Home, and to cut Napanee very short indeed, so as to get to Kingston at the right time—that is, about six ; and after the address we had to drive some way, and go in a steamer to Mr. Cartwright's, where we stay.

I felt very unready to go back to Kingston after dinner to hold a reception ; but it had to be done, and through rain and lightning we returned there.

There were a great many people in a brilliant room, and after we left the "young things" danced, but I have not yet seen them to hear about it. I have forgotten to mention that brother Fred left for England on the morning of the 3d.

Sunday, 6th.—Kingston is prettily situated, almost at the beginning of the Thousand Islands; and sitting under the trees here and resting is delightful.

Monday, 7th.—We have had a lovely journey through the Thousand Islands, the weather being beautiful. We had a comfortable steamer all to ourselves, one full of people following us. When we came in sight of Brockville, a hundred small row-boats came to meet us; each one had a lady in it, and a flag, and it was a very pretty sight. When we landed we got into a carriage, and the horses immediately stood upon their hind legs; and as continual experiences of the sort have spoiled my nerves, I got out, and took a lower place behind two lambs; these, however, had the misfortune to run their noses up against a flag, and shied fearfully; so I was really delighted to think that this was my last drive.

Here D. made a speech, in which he gave some account of our reception at different places, and said: “During the six weeks my tour has occupied, I believe that I have received something like one hundred and twenty addresses, every one of which breathed a spirit of contentment, loyalty, and kindness. In fact, from first to last, no harsh, desponding, or discordant note has marred the jubilant congratulations of the nation. But the demonstrations with which we have been honored have not been confined to mere vocal greetings. It would be impossible to describe either the beauty or the variety of the triumphal emblems which have glittered on either hand along our way. In addition to the graceful and picturesque decorations of evergreens, flags, tapestry, and prismatic canopies of color from window to window, with which the towns were gay, we have passed under a number of the most ingenious and suggestive arches. There was an arch of cheeses, an arch of salt, an arch of wheels, an arch of hardware, stoves, and pots and pans, an arch of sofas, chairs, and household furniture, an arch of ladders, laden with firemen in their picturesque costumes, an arch of carriages, an arch of boats; a Free-trade arch, a Protectionists' arch, an arch of children, and last of all an arch—no, not an arch, but rather a celestial rainbow—of lovely young ladies! Indeed, the heavens themselves dropped fatness, for not infrequently a magic cheese or other comestibles would descend into our carriage. As for Lady Dufferin, she has been nearly smothered beneath the nosegays which rained down upon her, for our path has been strewn with flowers."

We had a reception in the Victoria Hall, and then returned to the train. We stopped at Smith's Falls, where there was a charming little reception, though we did not go farther than the station. We also stopped in the same way at Carleton Place, and D. made his last speech. Two Ministers, M. Letellier and M. Fournier, met us at Smith's Falls, and at Ottawa all the Ministers came to the station. They are all pleased with the success of the tour, and delighted with the Toronto speech.

A fine guard of honor met us at Ottawa. The Governor-General's guards looked splendid, and even our Colonel was satisfied.

We gave a sigh of relief when we got home. The house looked so nice: a cheerful little fire (merely for the look of the thing) in the drawing-room; Fred's office grown, and with a fine glass side to it; my bedroom re-papered and new-carpeted, and looking so large after all the various rooms and cabins I have slept in; the quiet so charming, and the idea of not having to catch a train in the morning, of not having to reply to an address, of not having to visit three or four towns before we go to bed again, and of having "got through" with flying colors—delightful!

We asked our faithful reporters and Colonel Cumberland to dinner, and we congratulated each other all the time.

So ended our tour of 1874, which has been very delightful, though I am so glad of a rest now.

CHAPTER XIII.

WINTER AND SPRING, 1874-75.

Ottawa: Tuesday, September 15th.—We opened the Dominion Rifle Match, and I fired the first shot, and am said to have made a bull's-eye—which some people won't believe, in spite of my having received an engraved silver tablet in commemoration of the event!

Saturday, October 3d.—D. went out hunting. They had a very good drag for about twenty minutes, and then a bagged fox was let loose; but he sat quietly looking at the hunt, and refused to stir. The man near gave him a kick, upon which he ran at him, and after him with open mouth; and at last he bolted into a wood, and so was altogether a failure.

Saturday, 10th.—We have received invitations from New York: one to D., from some of the principal men there, inviting him to dinner on Monday, 19th; and one from Mrs. Wilson, asking if she might issue invitations to meet me on the same afternoon.

Monday, 12th.—We set off on our journey to New York, leaving about ten in the morning and traveling all day and all night till we got to our destination the next morning.

Tuesday, 13th.—When we arrived the town looked gay and bright—so many creepers and trees, and bits of gardens and lawns; but the day was dull and cold. We had visits from some people, made some engagements, and took a good walk down Broadway. Mr. Duncan sent us a box for "Madame Angot," to which we went, and enjoyed it much. We are at the Brevoort House, which is comfortable, but very dear. Our rooms and one fire are $18.50 a day, and the servants' board and lodging will be ($5) £1 a day each.

Dinner is made disagreeable to me by the menu having a price attached to each thing. I do not like, when eating my soup, to know that my share of it is 75 cents, and that my potato costs 30 cents, and that "some more" will go down as another order on the bill. Seeing the prices enables one to be economical, if one wishes, but it makes that virtue even more disagreeable than it usually is.

Wednesday, 14th.—Mr. Sam Ward called, and I believe some engagements are made with him. I went to do a little shopping, wanting, among other things, a dark parasol. I was asked £6 for a very ordinary black one, with a little silver at the handle.

In the afternoon I set out on a round of visits, and found the distances immense. I had to go to 74th Street, which is miles away, and D. started to walk there, and pitied himself very much. In the evening, having had an opera-box given us, we took the Fletchers to see "Ruy Blas." The performers were not of the Patti order. The house is fine, though too bare-looking. It wants some more boxes and more shade. The box we had was very open, and had none of the privacy of an English one.

Thursday, 15th.—This evening we went to a theatre owned by Mr. Stuart, and were very much amused by a thoroughly American piece from Mark Twain's novel of The Gilded Age. The house was very full, and the people seemed especially pleased at jokes which alluded to the corruption of their own Legislature. The heroine shoots her false lover with a revolver, and the last act caricatured a Yankee court of justice, with its appeal to the feelings of the jury, and its verdict of "Not Guilty," though the murder was completely proved. The principal actor was excellent—Raymond by name—and the woman was good in the tragic parts, but looked much too wicked in her innocent days at the beginning of the play.

Mr. Stuart told me he made £20,000 a year by his theatre. He is getting up Sunday concerts, to "relieve the loneliness of the Sabbath evening."

Ladies go to theatres in bonnets, and were not very smart at the opera.

Friday, 16th.—I saw Sir Edward Thornton, who called, and at the appointed time D, and I started for General Wilson's house in 74th Street. I was in a morning gown and bonnet, but found my hostess in a low dress! Every one else, however, was like myself, and only those took off their bonnets who (I suppose) looked best without them. I had to do duty, standing at the door all the time, and shaking hands with every one, for two hours.

Mr. Sam Ward sent me a most lovely bouquet of pink and yellow rosebuds for this reception.

Saturday, 17th.—We drove through Central Park to Jerome Park, where the races took place. We were in the Jockey Club stand, opposite the Grand Stand, and the horses passed twice between the two, so that we saw both the beginning and the end of the race very well.

Sir Edward Thornton dined with D. and me, and we took him to a theatre in which we had been given a box. We had not been there three minutes before we found it was such a piece which we could possibly not stay to see. Imagine the history of the temptation and fall of man in burlesque upon the stage!

Sunday, 18th.—We went to an unsatisfactory church to-day: little service and much sermon. I walked home, and met all the world doing the same. As a crowd, the Americans are better dressed than we are, but I do not think that they excel our best-dressed people, such as appear at Ascot or Goodwood; and they are not, to my mind, so pretty. We dined with Mr. A. T. Stewart, a Belfast man, who came out here at sixteen, and must be very rich. His palace is entirely of white marble. In our honor the dinner was at six instead of at three. A silver dish-cover lay before Mr. Stewart; at each course it was removed, the dish of food put in its place, to be looked at for a minute, then taken away to be helped, and the cover replaced. When it was over we saw the picture gallery and the house. I liked Mrs. Stewart—she seemed very simple and natural. We sat in each room in turn: a little in the drawing-room, a short time in the library, a few minutes in the billiard-room, a little while in her bedroom, etc. The latter is very beautiful, and I suppose it is slept in, but it does not look as if it were.

There was a lady there who was just like a conventional Yankee on the stage. She announced, first, that she had told her husband she would never put on black for him, as she meant to marry again as quick as ever she could. Then she informed me in a light and cheerful manner that she had had convulsions every Sunday since January, and that this was the first occasion upon which she had not been ill! She next proceeded to tell her domestic troubles, and how she had had to get a policeman to turn her cook out of her house. When she got so far, a more fashionable person came up, and would talk “opera” to me, so I heard no more.

Monday, 19th.—I walked in the streets, and paid a number of visits, and in the evening I went to the opera with Mrs. Stevens. It was "Ruy Blas" again, as Al-bani, who had just arrived, was too unwell to sing yet. C. Yznaga was the young lady of the party, and there was a stream of young men passing through all the time. No one seemed to dream of listening!

D. was dining with thirty gentlemen at Delmonico's; the dinner went off well, and there were no speeches.

Tuesday, 20th.—D. had a breakfast given to him by Mr. Sam Ward, which he liked immensely, and in the evening a dinner, which he also enjoyed.

Thursday, 22d.—We started off before nine in the morning to a railway-station, where we were met by Mr. Dudley Field, and went by train to Tarrytown.

There a coach-and-four, driven by Mr. Dudley Field, Jr., awaited us. We were glad to see the country; there were pretty villas all along, and a capital road. The view ought to have been lovely, but a fog hung over the Hudson, and hid its opposite bank. We returned by road to Irvington, where we saw Washington Irving's "Sleepy Hollow," passed in front of Cyrus Field's house to see the view, and then stopped at Dudley Field's, Jr., for lunch, or rather breakfast, for we had only had a cup of tea before starting. Every one was very kind, and we enjoyed it very much; then we drove back to the station and returned to New York.

Friday, 23d.—Another country day. This time we took the ferry, and went over to Orange Valley, where Mrs. Yznaga lives. She gave us Spanish and Cuban dishes; the first, "gumbo," a curious gelatinous soup, with oysters, chicken, sassafras-leaves, and red pepper in it. Then a dish with rice and tomatoes in the middle, grilled chicken and fried bananas round; then various sorts of light pastry, and chocolate to drink. We returned about four o'clock. Our party consisted of Miss Stevens, Madame van Hoffman, and Bret Harte.

We dined with Mr. and Mrs. Morton, and met Mr. and Mrs. Duncan, Mr. and Mrs. Randolph Robinson, General Taylor, and Consuela Yznaga. We dined at 6.30, as we were all going on to the opera. They gave us a very nice, pretty dinner, and we only missed the first act of "Lucia," and enjoyed the rest very much. Albani, who sang for the second time here, was very well received, and we are proud of her as a Canadian.

Saturday, 24th.—We went with Mr. Duncan to see Mr. Belmont's picture-gallery, and on to the house of a gentleman who is rich, and collects pictures. D. then went with Mr. Bierstadt to see his pictures, and afterwards made a round of galleries.

In the evening we saw "The Romance of a Poor Young Man" acted by Mr. Montague, whom the young ladies here call "a lovely man."

Sunday, 25th.—D. had to leave for Washington before nine o'clock, so we dined quietly with some very nice people. It amused me to observe in what way their dinner differed from one we should give. Their house is handsome and comfortable, and they are very rich; but their table was large for the number of people, and had absolutely nothing on it—not a bonbon, a flower, a bit of china, a candle, a bit of food—so it looked very bare. We had oysters, soup, fish, an entrée, cold beef—as a compliment to the Sunday—and a hot pudding. The cloth was then taken off, and we sat at a mahogany dessert-table once again.

Monday, 26th.—D. went to Washington, where he arrived at six in the morning, and was just settling down to a quiet sleep in his train-bed, when he heard Sir E. Thornton had come to meet him, so he had to jump up at once. Sir Edward gave him a cup of tea, and took him a walk, then breakfast, and then a drive to all the sights. He saw the President, who was very civil and called upon him, and Mr. Fish, and then started for Baltimore, where he slept.

Tuesday, 27th.—D. returned, and when he had had a cup of tea we paid a few visits in different directions; after dinner he attended a political meeting at Tammany Hall, which interested him.

Wednesday, 28th.—In the morning Mr. Cyrus Field came for us, and we went to see the Normal School. We sat upon a platform with the teachers, and at nine precisely music struck up, and 1,200 girls marched in, and in about two and a half minutes were seated. Of course, this can only be done by the most perfect arrangement, and is quite a military manœuvre. A chapter in the Bible was read, and a hymn sung. The President got up and said: "Young ladies, I present to you the Earl of Dufferin, Governor-General of Canada, and his Lady"; and D. said a few appropriate words. The President then said: "The young ladies of the First Section will repeat their quotations"; and one after another a number of girls got up, and repeated something they had learned. This is a voluntary exercise, and is intended to give them confidence in speaking before a number of people. These girls are all being trained as teachers. After this a chord was struck, and they all rose, and to music marched to the various class-rooms. We followed to the exercise-rooms, where we saw a hundred or so doing gymnastics. Then we peeped in at chemistry, geology, drawing, and Latin classes.

Our next visit was to a common school, and the children's department was very interesting. There were 1,150 collected in one room, and they marched in at a much slower pace than their elders, and with an air of solemnity that was most amusing. The second half of the room had the seats raised toward the back, and a view was painted on the wall which finished the scene admirably. At a signal from the mistress the 1,150 heads went up in the air; at another, there was clapping of hands; at another, singing; and so on. We also saw the big boys and big girls. There are 2,500 children at school in that one building.

Friday, 30th.—D. dined with Mr. Stoughton last night, and I went about eight o'clock to fetch him. The landlord of our hotel went with me, and sat by me in the carriage, and then I realized how wanting I had been in not shaking hands with him when I first arrived at the hotel.

We traveled all night, and though the beds themselves were comfortable, the night was not. The engine kept up a perpetual shriek, and the train went more like an animal than a machine—in jerks and with varieties of speed.

When we reached our destination—the Revere House, Boston—I rested, but D. put off his nap, and took a walk.

Later we drove in an open carriage through the town. The streets are narrower than those of New York, but appear to be very busy and full of people and vehicles. There are some handsome buildings, and the "residences" seem very nice. There are pretty public gardens, and a common, on which a great many good houses look out. We visited Bunker's Hill and Harvard College. The Memorial Hall, built to the memory of the former students who were killed in the War, is where the young men dine, and is very handsome. We saw one student's private room, plain and comfortable. Then we visited Mr. Longfellow, and found him in a nice old-fashioned house, where Washington was living when he took command of the American Army. The poet's study is a plainly-furnished room, with a large orange-tree standing in one window. He is a most charming and lovable old man; he gave me one of his poems as a souvenir of my visit, and he invited D. to dine at the Club dinner to-morrow, so we remain for that. Just as we were going out of the house his daughter Alice appeared, and he introduced her to us.

We have our meals in the American fashion here, in a public room: there are numbers of small tables for ten people; sometimes we are alone, sometimes there are other people at our table; at every meal the first ceremony always is to place a glass of iced water before us.

In the evening we went to the Boston Theatre—a fine one, with spacious entrance-hall. The theatre itself, very large and beautifully decorated, finer than any we saw in New York. The piece was "Belle Lamar," a story of the War, and was very interesting and well put upon the stage. Here they have a farce both before and after, while in New York there was only one piece given in each theatre.

Saturday, 31st.—We drove this morning to Dorchester Heights, and to see some more of the city, and at 2.30 D. went to his Club dinner. He has been very lucky to be here for it. It takes place only once a month, and he met at it Longfellow, Lowell, Emerson, Dana, Dana, Jr., Holmes (the Autocrat of the Breakfast Table), etc. They have all promised him books as a remembrance of the occasion.

I took a walk in the town, and in the evening D. and I went to the Museum Theatre. It is not so fine as the Boston, but it is uncommon in one way; you pass through a museum to it—statues, pictures, stuffed animals, etc. The play was "Arkwright's Wife," by Tom Taylor—very good indeed. The heroine was pretty and graceful, and all the parts were well filled.

Sunday, November 1st.—We tried two churches before we could get a seat, and the third we attempted to enter turned out to be a Universalist church. It is one of the Old-English chapels, and the service was our Liturgy very slightly altered, and a sermon upon All Saints' Day. This service is intended to suit everybody, whatever their opinions may be; and in many places in Canada where they can not support a number of different sects, they have these Universalist churches.

We drove afterwards, and saw a great deal of the neighborhood. The villas are very pretty, and the country is English-looking.

We had to dine at four—American system! However, it will enable us to go to bed early, and prepare for thirteen hours' railway to-morrow to Montreal.

Monday, 2d.—The day passed much more pleasantly than I expected, and we really enjoyed the journey. We had a very comfortable compartment to ourselves, passed through beautiful scenery (seeing the Green Mountains and several rivers), and had two most excellent meals. Generally they only wait ten minutes for dinner, but, thanks to our “high office,” they gave us half an hour.

Ottawa : Saturday, 7th.—I have had nothing particular to relate since our return here, but to-day I took Mr. Hepworth Dixon, who is staying with us, his son, and Lady Harriet, to the steeplechases.

Four horses started in each race; the first was for the Governor-General's Challenge Cup, and the only fall was that of a man of fifty-seven—rather old to do “jockey.” His horse swerved at a pole, and the rider lay still for several seconds on the ground and frightened us; but he got up and walked about all the rest of the day. We saw the same horse ridden by a jockey proper in the last race; he swerved at the same place every time he came round to it, and so lost the race. There was constant variety in this race, for the order of the running changed every few seconds.

Wednesday, 18th.—Colonel Fletcher got his recall from England to-day, and I fear they will all have to leave in February. Lady Harriet will be a terrible loss to me; she has been my constant companion, and was always ready to do everything and to enjoy everything with me; the most sympathetic person I have ever met. We had many things in common, and I can not bear to think of her departure yet.

Saturday, 21st.—The new General,* Selby Smyth, and his A. D. C., Mr. Miles Stapleton, came to stay till Monday. The A. D. C. looks very "jolly," and will be an acquisition to Fred, I think. But the really exciting question is, "Does he look as if he would dance the Boston?" which all the young ladies have been practising.

Colonel Barnard and a very big and pleasant Chief Justice—Begbie, from British Columbia—came to dinner. The latter has been out there sixteen years, and has, I believe, succeeded in making the law respected by Indians and other "wild men." He gave us an amusing description of the difficulties which occur from the Indian plan of families and property descending in the female line.

Saturday, 28th.—A heavy snowstorm during the night and nearly all day. The children, with the help of Colonel Fletcher, Mr. Dixon, and a ladder, have erected in front of my window an enormous and hideous snowman, who will remain an eyesore to me the whole winter, unless some kind friend assassinates him. I was threatened with a wife for him, but I am in hopes that a judicious suggestion I have made as to the appropriateness of making the pair stand as spectators over the Skating Rink may induce the builders to model the statues there. The creature has a carrot nose, and lips of the same material, coals for eyes, and an old hat on his head; he is eight feet high, and stands right in my way, hiding my view of the Parliament Buildings. In the evening he was illuminated with red and green fire.

Tuesday, December 15th.—There was some very good tobogganing to-day. The new slide is most exciting, for, the natural hill not being considered sufficiently steep, a great addition* has been made to it. A long flight of stairs now leads to the top of a high wooden slide, and, as this is almost perpendicular, the toboggan starts at a rapid rate down it—and its occupant has both the length and the excitement of his slide greatly increased. To-day the wooden part of the slide is a sheet of ice, so the toboggans rush down it at a tremendous pace.

Friday, 18th.—Gwen and Katie* arrived about five o'clock, looking extremely well.

Christmas Day, Friday, 25th.—An ideal Christmas Day—the weather lovely, twenty degrees of frost, and a bright sun. The children had received presents from their governess and nurses in the morning, and were in great excitement. After breakfast they came down, and we introduced Nelly and Hermie to a dolls' house, which delighted them. Hallie had dressed a number of inhabitants for it, and it is a charming toy.

In the afternoon, every one, except me, went out and had a very pleasant afternoon skating and tobogganing.

* My sisters.

I found plenty of work at the Christmas-tree, which was ready directly after tea. The only contretemps of the day happened just as the children were jumping with excitement to go in to see it. The gas went out, and we had to wait more than half an hour for it to recover. In the mean time we got up a dwarf, which amused them much. The tree was next lighted up, and was greeted with cheers. The fifteen children—the eldest eleven years old—were all perfectly delighted, and were much too pleased with the treasures they had received to feel inclined to play games afterwards. They simply sat on the floor absorbed in their new possessions, with sighs of perfect happiness. The youngest of the party was one of the happiest; she ran about the floor pulling a sheep after her, and looked such a pretty little dear. The big people also went away laden. We were fourteen at dinner, with governesses, secretaries, etc., and in the evening we played games.

Friday, January 1, 1875.—We were more or less busy in the morning making the arrangements for the children's play, and from 2.30 to 4.30 His Ex. and I were "at home" to receive visitors. We had 211 gentlemen, who said "How do you do?" had a glass of wine or a cup of tea, and passed away.

We refreshed ourselves with a little tea when the reception was over, and then I dressed for the evening, and helped to paint the actors.

The play took place upon a small stage erected in the ante-room to the ball-room. Mr. Dixon wrote the piece and painted the scenes. "Pussy-cat, Mew-mew" was the name of the play, and it went off very well. Fred was excellent in the part he undertook, and was well made-up, with red stockings, red knickerbockers, a brown blouse, and red wig. Fred Ward was the master-magician, in a dressing-gown covered with mysterious signs. Nelly looked very pretty in white tarlatan and gold, a crown on her head, and a wand in her hand. Archie was a prince in green and silver; Terence, the "Man in the Moon," in red. Hermie, a pink fairy; and all the others in the same style of costume in different colors. Terence's first appearance was through the full moon, and he did his part very well. All have very much improved in acting since last year.

The tableaux were very pretty. I had to be behind the scenes, and so only managed to see one myself, which I will describe to you.

The foreground of the stage was painted in dark colors to represent a cavern, and the back opened, displaying a brilliant grotto in gold and silver and red. Hermie stood on a raised rock of gold at the top; beneath her sat three little ones, with baby in the center, who was enchanted with her position. Terence lay at their feet in his red moon-costume, and grouped beneath were Archie, Nelly, Maud, Edward, etc. They were lighted up with various colored fires. Baby amused us so by giving three cheers in the middle of the performance. The other tableaux were scenes in a tournament: the Encounter, the Result, and the Coronation of the Victor.

Friday, 22d.—D. played the final game of the curling-match with Colonel Fletcher, and won a cup presented by me.

We had a large children's party, and we repeated the play. Directly it was over we had tea for sixty-five children, who seemed very hungry and very happy, and after that dancing and a few games till eight, when the little people left.

Monday, 25th.—D. started for Montreal. I copy the following out of his letters:

"We had not left Ottawa ten minutes before the train came to a stand, and all our sweepers had to jump out. By their exertions we got on another few hundred yards, when a second stop occurred.

"This kind of business went on for nearly an hour, at the end of which time the Parliament Buildings were still in sight. After a little, however, matters improved."

"On arriving at Montreal we found our rooms looking very cheerful, and a nice little supper ready, for which those marvelous ladies* were again quite ready.

"Tuesday, 26th.—We started at eleven o'clock for the Rink; found the Bethunes, Miss Campbell, Mr. Maxwell, and a couple of nice Englishmen. With these playfellows we passed a couple of hours very pleasantly, and executed a brilliant lancers.

"At 2.30 the two Freds and I and Nowell went to have a game of curling, preparatory to a match to-morrow with four of the oldest members of the Montreal Club, whose united ages, I believe, are to amount to something like 350 years. We did not play well, and got a bad beating, though we ended by winning the two last ends, the latter of which was an end of four. The girls went out walking with Colonel Fletcher. Maxwell and the other two young men I have mentioned dined with us, and at ten we went to the ball. It was a nice, large square room, with beautiful music, excellent parqueterie, and very jolly. Gwen looked very well, and I liked her dress. As you may suppose, she got lots of partners."

Monday, February 1st.—The great event of the day was the opening of the new theatre here—the first one at Ottawa. The house is really very nice, and the state box a very comfortable and convenient one.

Tuesday, 9th.—A great curling-match was played between our club and the Renfrew Club, for a medal presented by the Caledonian Club. Four of ours had to go to Renfrew, and four of their men came here; so the winner could not be announced till the two games were over. The two Freds and Messrs. Baker and Dixon went early to Renfrew, and D., Nowell, Colonel Fletcher, and Robertson were the team who remained here. The game began at ten, and they had to play for three hours. The V. R. C. C. were at one time five behindhand, but they finally won by one; and an hour later we heard by telegraph that at Renfrew they were ties, so we won the medal by the one shot. This is the first public match our club has played. The boys got home to dinner, and we talked curling and played whist all the evening.

Friday, 12th.—We had a large dinner-party to-day—married Ministers and their wives. A great division was expected in the House; so they went off there after dinner, and they amnestyed Riel during the night.

Wednesday, March 31st.—My baby-boy * is now five weeks old, so I was able to be present at the second representation of the “Maire of St. Brieux,” of which the first performance had been extremely successful. It is an operetta, written by Mr. Dixon, whom you know well by name, and composed by Mr. Mills, the organist in Ottawa. The music is very pretty and the whole play excellent; it is very interesting to bring out a new thing on one’s own stage, and even the author and composer must have been satisfied with the actors and singers who played in it. The prima donna, Mrs. Anglin, both sang and looked charmingly, and the Maire himself, Mr. Kimber, was quite perfect.

I asked the actors to keep on their costumes during the evening, and they made the party look very gay and pretty, the girls' colored petticoats and high, white caps, and the men's bright-colored clothes being very effective.

Wednesday, April 21st.—There was a severe frost last night, so we determined to have some skating on the Curling Rink—rather late in the year for my first skate!

Sunday, 25th.—Baby was christened by the name of Frederick Temple.

Tuesday, May 11th.—We leave for three months' holiday in England, and had quite a sad parting with the seven little ones. General Selby Smyth met us, with his A. D. C., at the gate, and at the station there was a crowd of people to wish us adieu and bon voyage. The day was lovely. At Montreal we were met by General O'Grady Haly,* who is to be Administrator during D.'s absence.

Wednesday, 12th.—A torrent of rain falling all day. We left Montreal early, and spent ten hours in the train, reaching Quebec about six in the evening.

Friday, 14th.—A very stormy night, slates blowing about, and we go on board to-morrow!

Saturday, 15th.—Such a dreadful morning: snow, rain, and cold wind of the bitterest description. D. sent to beg the Mayor not to bring the steamers out to accompany ours, as it was impossible for any ladies to go in them. The Lieutenant-Governor came for us, and drove us down to the Polynesian. One steamer did go with us for a little way with a band on board. They played "He is a Jolly Good Fellow" and "God save the Queen," and cheered us when we parted. This was about 1 P. M.

At three we stopped suddenly, and on sending out to inquire we found we were ashore! We got off soon, but at four we were stuck again; this time we were told we could not get off till high-water, at two o'clock in the night. We have a very comfortable sitting-room on deck, with a warm-water stove in it, and next to it the smoking-room, in which we have our meals privately. Our sleeping-berths are comfortable.

* The General Officer commanding H. M. Forces in British North America.

Sunday, 16th.—Awoke to find ourselves stuck. No hopes of getting off till 4 P. M., at high-water. One of the boats went out to do something or other, and could not get back; another was sent after her, and now both, with a large proportion of our crew, are gone. I suppose when we do get off we shall go after them.

Tuesday, 18th.—In the afternoon we sighted a field of ice, which looked very pretty in the rosy evening. Some small pieces floated round the vessel, and during the night we got into quite a thick part of it, and had to stop.

Wednesday, 19th.—Loose and large pieces of ice all round us—some, dirty brown-looking lumps, others white, and all rough and ragged. A fog over all, a wet deck, a ship stopped on its voyage—such are the pleasures we find on this May day. About five o'clock we began to move slowly through the ice. It was a fascinating employment, that of watching the great “Juggernaut” we were in cutting and pushing its way through this field of ice. Sometimes we went through great pieces, just as a knife cuts through a wedding-cake, sometimes the piece resisted us to a certain degree, and we had to push it slowly aside before we could get on.

Thursday, 20th.—I awoke about five in the morn, hearing the vessel crunch up against the ice; at ten we were free, but in a fog; the steam-horn blew all day.

As soon as we got far enough south we turned the corner of the ice, and went on our way rejoicing, in spite of a great deal of fog, and fog-whistling.

CHAPTER XIV.

AN UNEVENTFUL SEASON 1875-76.

Friday, October 22d.—I sent you a post-card from Londonderry telling you that we were off on our return to Canada after our holiday at home. We got on board on a very disagreeable evening, but we thought the wind was lessening, and that we should probably have a calm passage. We talked of seeing land on Thursday, and made up our minds to reach Quebec at the latest by Tuesday. Thursday, however, found us very near Ireland, in a regular storm, which lasted two days and two nights, during which time we scarcely made any progress. In twenty-four hours we only made forty knots, and the Captain said he had never been so delayed in his life before. We were obliged to remain below, and I can't tell you how dreary it was, rolling perpetually for two days and two nights in one's berth. Later on we saw some beautiful icebergs; and now that I have seen field-ice, icebergs, fog, and a storm, I do not wish for any new experience of life at sea. We got to Quebec this morning, and found the weather beautiful, but very cold. One steamer, which left the Monday before us, arrived yesterday with her bulwarks washed away, and having lost three boats. Our Prussian received no damage; she is such a good sea-boat.

The General, Lieutenant-Governor, etc., came to meet us, and our landing at this lovely place was very pretty. It is so gay and sunny, and the Canadian air does feel so exhilarating. The children sent letters of welcome to meet us at Father Point, begging us not to stop on the way anywhere. We go on by the boat this afternoon, and reach Ottawa at four to-morrow.

Tuesday, 26th.—Colonel and Mrs. Littleton,* who have come out with us in place of Colonel and Lady Harriet Fletcher, reached Ottawa yesterday, and are at the hotel there. They came to lunch, and to see their house.

Thursday, 28th.—Lawn-tennis, and a drive. The Littleton children came to tea, and quite won the hearts of mine. They expected to see “the King of Canada” in a crown and train, and still think that at some future time he will appear in full dress.

Wednesday, November 3d.—The new tennis-court has been begun. It is to serve the purpose of a supper-room as well.

Saturday, 13th.—We are proposing later in the season to give a fancy ball, and are already deep in millinery-talk.

Thursday, 18th.—We skated for the first time this year, on the Rideau, where we had swept a place.

We had a great dinner to-night for the Judges of the Supreme Court (sixty-two guests), and had a large T-shaped table spread in the ball-room for it.

Monday, December 6th.—Lovely day, and the skating-ice simply perfect. We have had a man from Montreal to teach us to flood it properly, and the result of his instructions is excellent.

Thursday, 9th.—There was great excitement at receiving a box directed to me from “the Queen.” It contained a pretty doll, dressed in the smartest blue velvet gown, for Victoria. She was delighted, and carried it about all the evening.

Saturday, 11th.—We asked Miss Kingsford, Miss Patrick, and some of the other good skaters to come to-day, that we might practice our figures. This was a real, true skating-party, with no temptations to toboggan or dance, and it was very pleasant. We worked away at roses, double roses, thistles, lilies, snails, etc., and then we came in, had some tea, and talked about—the fancy ball.

Monday, 20th.—On Saturday we had the same people as last week, but as the thermometer was about 20° below zero, skating was a doubtful pleasure. Sunday was still colder, and to-day the weather is no milder.

Tuesday, 21st.—During the afternoon a sudden and comfortable change in the weather. They say there was a jump of 76° in the twelve hours; and certainly it became very warm, and a complete thaw set in after a very “cold snap” indeed.

Friday, 24th.—The snow is quite off the tobogganing-slide, and the Skating Rink is spoiled for the present; but it has begun to freeze again. I was very busy all day with Mrs. Hall, arranging the Christmas-tree. At five o’clock Gwen and Russell* and Fred Ward arrived. They met at Prescott. Gwen looks extremely well. During the severe frost in Montreal her hot-water pipes burst, and she was nearly frozen.

Saturday, 25th.—A wet Christmas Day in Canada! We went to church under umbrellas! However, it cleared up afterwards, but was at no time a nice day. At five o’clock the Littleton children came, and after tea the tree in the ball-room was lighted up, and the shrieking “brats” were admitted to it. The tree was very successful, and really looked very pretty. It was placed just in front of the Throne. Its natural eccentricities of shape were concealed by ropes of many-colored crackers and glass balls, and it was covered with small presents, and surrounded on the floor by larger ones, the whole being bounded by a paling of gayly-ornamented curling-brooms. On the floor were also to be seen four toboggans, presented by His Ex. to different people—one very lovely one for me. When the first excitement had a little subsided we began to take the things off the tree, and I am happy to say the children appeared well pleased with their presents.

Wednesday, 29th.—There was a great deal of curling to-day: in the morning a match between D., F. Ward and Russell Stephenson, Mackenzie, Fred and Colonel Littleton. We also drew for the match for my cup.

I anticipate great amusement in seeing Mrs. Littleton and Gwen watching their husbands play: they are both very excited over a game, and both offer much advice, and groan and triumph alternately—the ladies, I mean.

Saturday, New Year's Day, 1876.—We received our visitors between twelve and two to-day—225 gentlemen.

The day was very mild: rain in the afternoon, and no curling or skating—most sad and un-Canadian; but at any rate the weather was decidedly interesting to talk about.

My children had invited all the work-people and their children to come to tea and to see their play, "Little Nobody," written by Mr. Dixon. He has taken great pains with the scenery, which is quite beyond that of a mere amateur stage. There are a street and a castle, with a background of sea and sky, followed by a magnificent transformation scene, in which a silver-dressed fairy stands behind a star of many colors, the rays of which gradually part and open, leaving her supported on each side by minor fairies of the female sex, while two male fairies sit in cars underneath. This is the last scene of the play, and while this gorgeous sight is in the background the active performers in the piece are grouped in the front. We had an appreciative audience, filling the room.

Tuesday, 11th.—A very important curling-match took place in our rink, between the four “Fredericks” of the Viceregal Club and the four “Jameses” of the Ottawa Club. Alas! the Jameses won by one. There were tobogganing and skating after lunch. A lovely day—about zero.

Wednesday, 12th.—The married men of the Curling Club had a match against the single ones. The best bachelor was absent, and “little Campbell” (who is very short-sighted, and never plays) took his place. He was a great element of amusement; for, in the first place, he made by accident two most beautiful shots, then he fell in front of a stone while sweeping, etc. The bachelors were beaten by 18 to 2. There was much tobogganing in the afternoon, and a frightful upset, Fred and Colonel Littleton coming in with their noses scraped by the icy snow upon which they fell.

Thursday, 13th.—The bachelors determined to try and regain their laurels to-day, and marched in procession to the Rink. They were dressed in white blanket-coats, wore white kid gloves, and orange-flowers in their button-holes. Their fate was, however, as sad as yesterday.

Monday, 17th.—We had a large children’s party in the evening. When the fifty-five children and their mammas had arrived and seated themselves, “Little Nobody” began, and went most successfully till near the end, when in the middle of the last beautiful fairy transformation scene there was a fire, which might have been very bad. The man attending to a lime-light held a candle under an indiarubber pipe containing gas. The pipe melted, and the gas, of course, burned furiously; there were people rushing about, water flowing, and a great scrimmage going on, during which the imperturbable queen of the fairies continued her speech. Darkness ensued, and then we lifted the curtain and threw a rose-light over the scene; but of course the grand effect was spoilt, and the author and the carpenter burned their hands a little.

Wednesday, 19th.—We begin to feel that the fancy ball is near, and are making arrangements. I have been writing out the programmes. There are to be singing-quadrilles, valses, and lancers. The dancers have to learn and to rehearse their parts, and we expect this will be a very pretty feature in the ball.

Tuesday, 25th.—Spent a great deal of time over a most troublesome business—that of getting 150 parts copied for the singing quadrille; that is, thirty copies of each figure. You may imagine the confusion and the difficulty of arranging all these separate bits of paper. Fred Ward does the hardest part; but I help—and dream of it.

Saturday, 29th.—The thaw was so decided this morning that we gave up all idea of outdoor amusements. At two we rehearsed “School,” which is to be our next play, and as soon as the people had collected afterwards we danced. I got up a tempête, and made the elderly people join. I took a judge for my partner, who was very much astonished to find how hard he had to work, and received, I fear, a shock when he found that, having conducted him down to the bottom of our long room, I intended to take him up again at the same pace. After this came more waltzes, and a cotillon, which wound up the day.

Sunday, 30th.—The Comte Louis de Turenne arrived, and we took him a snow-shoe walk.

Monday, 31st.—We all—D. and I. the Littletons, the Freds, and the Comte de Turenne—started in a private car for Montreal.

Wednesday, March 1st.—A very stormy, snowy day, extremely cold, and no admittance to the Rink. In the evening there was a fancy dress ball on the ice. The Count, the Littletons, and those who had not seen this before, were delighted with the sight. It was bitterly cold, and I was glad to skate a little in a domino. I danced a set of lancers and some other things with D.

Thursday, 2d.—Some good skating in the morning, then a grand lunch at Mr. Ryan's, which our three Fredericks had to leave early, as they were going to join the fourth Frederick in playing against four Jameses. We meant to go and see the game, but when we arrived at the door of the Rink we met our party coming out, victorious and radiant.

Saturday, 4th.—We left Montreal by the morning train, taking with us the Comte de Turenne and Gawen.*

Tuesday, 7th.—The Marquis and Marquise de Bassano arrived this afternoon, just as we were finishing a laborious rehearsal of part of "School."

Wednesday, 8th.—A cold, windy day; however, we went out and skated. The Comte de Turenne is working hard at the outside edge. The Cabinet dinner took place to-night, and the new Ministers came for the first time, in their uniforms. The dinner was in the ball-room, and we had a band to play during the evening.

Thursday, 9th.—In the morning we had some skating and curling; the day was beautiful and mild. After lunch we went to the opening of Parliament.

* My brother, Colonel Gawen R. Hamilton.

On our return the energetic gentlemen had a great afternoon's tobogganing, but Madame de Bassano and I rested, as we had to dine at seven, and be present at the Drawing-room afterwards. I never saw so many people at one before, and I must have made an enormous number of courtesies. The boys went to a dance after the Drawing-room.

Friday, 10th.—A complete thaw with pouring rain. The Bassanos left; and in the afternoon we rehearsed the first two acts of "School"—very successfully. Mr. Kimber and Miss Fellowes remained for dinner, and in the evening the other twenty-eight singers arrived, and we rehearsed the singing quadrilles, lancers, and waltz. The lancers went beautifully, and the waltz is very pretty.

Saturday, 11th.—This was such a lovely day, so bright and so mild that it was doubtful whether there would be any skating. Guests kept telegraphing from Ottawa, "Can I bring my toboggan?"

Fortunately, we were able both to skate and to toboggan, and as it was very pleasant for the lookers-on, we remained out till past five, and had a most successful party. This is the last we can have before our ball, which now draws near.

Our new supper-room, with its red-and-white tent, let down inside the tennis-court, and the shields bearing the arms of the various provinces hung round its walls, will be very pretty. The ball-room is wreathed in roses.

Wednesday, 22d.—The American painter, Mr. Bierstadt, and his wife are staying in the house with us, and he has begun to paint me a picture as a remembrance of his visit. It will be a nice thing to have. We went out, and saw the great curling-match of the year, for His Ex.'s medal. Montreal won it. The sixteen players had lunch with us.

We dressed for the fancy ball at nine—all our household in costumes of the same period—and walked in procession up the room. The dresses of our guests were beautiful, and there was great variety in them. The singing-dances and the new supper-room were much admired, and when people went away at 4 A. M. they seemed extremely pleased.

Saturday, 25th.—It snowed hard—in fact, I have never seen the snow round us so deep. The Littletons have to be almost dug out every day, and the road to their house is on a level with the palings.

Monday, 27th.—The French members of the Commons gave a beautiful ball in the new Library at Ottawa, to which we went. The room, an enormous round building, was very well lighted. I believe fifteen hundred people were in it, and there was no crush at all. We enjoyed it very much. Numbers of people wore their fancy dresses.

Wednesday, 29th.—The Comte de Turenne arrived for the play. The actors dined early in D.'s room. Then I went to dress for Mrs. Honeyton, in the "Happy Pair." Then the "School" arrived, and began to dress in one room, and the men had another, and the guests came crowding in, and got off their things in the school-room, and there were painting and curling and excitement going on everywhere.

Fred and I began the performance with "A Happy Pair," and had a very warm audience, which was pleasant. "School" is a very difficult piece for amateurs; but I must say that it was an unequivocal success. Every part was well done, and it was quite new here, so the audience liked it immensely. I was really surprised when I came into the supper-room to see how handsome it looked, and it certainly is a much needed addition to the house, enabling us to give supper to a large party at once. Afterwards I went into the drawing-room, and said good-night to all the beaming crowd.

Tuesday, April 11th.—Such a lovely day. We play tennis, walk, lunch, practice some music, drive into Ottawa, and go to a birthday-party of the Littletons, where there was to be a magic lantern. I took six children, and Victoria enjoyed her first party immensely, and applauded every slide. When a somewhat undraped statue was exhibited, she exclaimed that “Hallie would pip (whip) her.”

Monday, 17th.—Gwen, Miss Abbot, and I drove into Ottawa in the morning, and after lunch walked to the river Rideau to see the ice coming down. We stood for some time watching great blocks go over the Falls, and then went to look over a bridge a little way off; but after a little we saw such masses of ice rushing towards the Falls, that we returned to our original place, and when we got there found that a new bridge immediately over them, upon which we had been standing a few minutes before, had been partly carried away. We sat down where we could have a good view of the river, and saw such a smashing, and heard such a crashing of timber. There was great excitement on the spot—men and horses hard at work cutting and dragging away what could be saved from the wreck.

Thursday, May 11th.—The waters of the Ottawa are six feet higher than they have been for years, and there is much more ice to come down; there are floods everywhere.

Tuesday, 16th.—The weather deserves to be recorded, for it really was fine, bright and sunny, and unlike anything we have had before this month. A few mosquitoes were able to appear, but they are not strong enough either to buzz or to bite.

Thursday, June 1st.— 103° in the shade. I was “at home,” and received my visitors in the garden from four to six, when it was cooler and very pleasant. They looked at a game of tennis, and seemed to enjoy the garden.

Wednesday, 7th.—D. and I, Nelly, the Smyths, and Littletons, left by a steamer at seven o'clock in the morning, and landed at Buckingham at eight. There we saw a lovely waterfall. The river Le Lièvre, a large tributary of the Ottawa, rushes at this place through a very narrow passage, and after falling a few feet the incline becomes more gradual, but the water tumbles over rocks and stones, and looks like a very steep rapid, unlike anything I have ever seen before, and very beautiful. This sight was only en passant. Nelly was delighted, and kept up a fire of joyful exclamations, which helped us to like getting up so early.

After driving through the village of Buckingham, which was gayly decorated with flags and arches, we got out at a wharf, and found a small steam-launch ready to take us up the river. We had twenty-five miles to go, and were to be four hours doing it. There were some swift rapids in the river, and when we came to the worst ones we were told that the steamer was too heavily laden, and that some of us must get out. We had a good deal of trouble landing the gentlemen, D. only remaining with us.

The small engine puffed away, but we made no progress, and we got very frightened. The bell-rope which the pilot used for giving his orders had been burned through, a lace curtain having caught fire early in the day, and when he called out his orders the stoker did not always seem to hear. D. tried to reassure us, but when we looked out and found that we remained exactly in the same place—off a great rock—we ladies were in an agony of terror. Then the boat began to turn round, and the gentlemen on shore were frightened too when they saw this manœuvre. They were powerless to help us, and they feared that if we were to touch a rock or the branch of a tree, while we had this powerful stream broadside on, we should be toppled over. By this time Nelly and I were both in tears, and it makes me laugh now to think of Nelly's face, the tears pouring down, as she exclaimed, "Oh! it will be so horrid to be drowned." However, we turned safely, and did get to the shore again, and there we landed, so that the steamer was light enough to get up the rapids, while we walked, and got into her above them.

We had all lost our appetites through fright—and they had been good—for we breakfasted at six, and it was three o'clock before we landed, still trembling, and had lunch on the shore. After that we had to walk a mile and a half to see the Fall, the object of our expedition.

The walk was rough, and we had some climbing and some steep places to go down, and there were a great many mosquitoes on the road, so that after our adventure we felt that the waterfall must really be fine to compensate us. When we arrived our first impression was that we could not see the waterfall for the foam, but it really was a splendid sight, and perfectly unlike any fall I ever saw or imagined. We stood on a rock about half-way down the Fall, and could neither see the breadth nor the height of it, but only the thickness of it. A river with a rapid stream passes through a very narrow passage here, and issues like a wall of water from between the rocks. I felt as if a puff of wind might topple it down over me. We went lower afterwards, and saw more of it; it is very high and very broad.

About six we returned to our boat, and when we asked for something to drink we found that everything had disappeared from our basket. Lucky for us that drinks had been preferred to silver spoons! Nelly and I rather dreaded the descent of our friend the rapid, but we got down safely in three hours.

We found a large bonfire burning at Buckingham, and a crowd of people. There we got into the carriages, and prospered till we came to a steep hill with a precipice on one side, in the middle of which our horses jibbed, and when they got us well to the edge of the "precipice," Nelly and I escaped through the window (a large one). The horses were led down the hill, and D. reproached us for leaving him alone in his peril.

It was rather cold all day on the water, but warm when we landed. We got back about eleven, very tired; but, in spite of all our troubles, we were glad to have seen those splendid falls.

When we undertook the expedition (invited by the owner of the steamer) we did not think it would take so long, and, in fact, knew little about it. The steamer has only been on that run for a few weeks, and scarcely any one has seen this Fall; but I think it is a most magnificent sight. A reporter was present, and it depends upon what he thought of the rapids whether other people are encouraged to go or not. As he was not in the boat, and had no friend to be alarmed about on board, his view will probably be cheerful.

Monday, 12th.—Packing day! Very hot, and every one melting and busy. Boxes and bags yawning all over the house. A holiday for the children.

Thursday, 15th.—We started early in the morning by train to Prescott, there got into the steamer, and had a pleasant voyage to Montreal, where we changed from one steamer to another, and came on to Quebec.

Quebec: Friday, 16th.—Arrived early, and landed at eight; the Lieutenant-Governor and a guard of honor came to meet us, and we found the children waiting breakfast. It was very hot, and we did not go out till the evening. D. and I then walked over the scene of the late fire—desolation over a large space.

Saturday, 17th.—We went to see the temporary accommodation arranged for the sufferers: charities have taken in some, and drill-sheds and barracks hold others. Poor people who have lost their all bore their misfortunes wonderfully, I thought. Very hot all day. In the evening we went to see the “Busy Bees” perform. They are the officers and soldiers of the B Battery, and represented on this occasion the Christy Minstrels, singing songs, etc.

Monday, 19th.—Three strangers dined with us: a Frenchman, an Austrian, and an Englishman. D. enjoyed it very much, as he heard something of European politics. I was “at home,” and saw many old friends in the afternoon.

Tuesday, 20th.—At ten o’clock there was a parade on the Esplanade—a review on a small scale, with the B Battery as performers. Then D. presented some medals and prizes won by the Battery. The weather was beautiful, but directly after a series of heavy thunder-showers came on, which lasted all day.

Wednesday, 21st.—The citizens of Quebec gave a great dinner to the Governor-General to-night. The room was most beautifully arranged, and the stage, at the far end of it, looked like a garden, with real flower-beds in the foreground, and a painted shrubbery behind them.

There was one long, straight table, at which the principal guests were sitting, with the Governor-General in the middle; and four more long ones ran down the room toward the gallery. About 200 gentlemen were present.

D. and his speech were immensely well received, and he spoke very well. He began by saying, "I can not help remembering under what various conditions, in how many vital emergencies, at what supreme epochs in its history, during the last 300 years, my illustrious predecessors must have had occasion to harangue the citizens of Quebec. In a thousand vicissitudes of fortune, in perpetual alternations of triumph and despondency—when hordes of savages were lurking round your palisades; when famine had prostrated your strength, and the unaccustomed rigors of an Arctic winter had benumbed your faculties; when novel forms of pestilence devastated your homes, crowning your clergy and your sisterhoods with the aureole of martyrdom; when foreign leaguers assaulted your independence, and hostile cannon threatened your battlements—Viceroy after Viceroy has appealed to your patience, your fortitude, your charity, your patriotism; and never once, whether in good fortune or ill fortune, as your history tells us, has the appeal been made in vain." At the end he proposed the toast of "Prosperity to Quebec."

Friday, 23d.—We visited the Sillery Convent, and then walked into a place belonging to Colonel Rhodes. He has underground gardens, which supply flowers, mushrooms, winter salads, etc. The Colonel, who entertained us most hospitably, has made quite a name for himself as a practical gardener here. The view from the house is lovely.

On our return home we had a long visit from the Bassanos, who were delighted with our platform. After dinner the soldiers had some very good theatricals.

Saturday, 24th.—D. went down to the steamer to say a few words to the Canadian rifle-team, now starting for Wimbledon.

I was "at home," and the lovely morning turned into a very bad afternoon. Thunder and showers and wind.

came on, and though I had many visitors, they were all uncomfortable. Some feared for their gowns, some disliked thunder, and some thought it would frighten their horses ; and I sincerely sympathized with them all.

Monday, 26th.—We went to the High School, and from it saw the procession of Jean Baptiste pass through the town on the way to the church. This is the great festival at Quebec.

We spent two hours at the Ursuline Convent in giving prizes to the pupil-teachers. D. made a speech to them, and commented upon the disrespectful way in which young ladies are alluded to on this continent, instancing the case of "Nellie Grant."

We returned home in time to see Gwen and Russell off to Montreal, and Gwen was obliged to continue waving her handkerchief to the children for several miles down the river.

In the evening we attended a concert given by the Jean Baptiste society. An address was presented to D., a great bouquet and gilt china jar to me, and fireworks were sent after us as we departed.

Tuesday, 27th.—A very busy day, preparing again for departure. I made time to call upon Lady Belleau, and took four children to see the Ursulines. It is a great treat to them to visit the nuns in their cage, and to receive maple sugar through the bars.

Wednesday, 28th.—We got off in the Druid; a lovely day, and everything on board very comfortable and nice. We enjoyed sailing calmly up the beautiful river. Mr. Gregory, the official who furnishes the yacht, presented me with a key and with a list of goodies, which he bought for my special benefit, and had locked up for me.

Friday, 30th.—Arrived at Gaspé at eight o'clock, most fortunate in having had so good a passage. Bad news of our river: they say it is much too high for fishing.

We went up to it, however—an hour's drive and three hours on horseback—Archie being the only one who really enjoyed this. Our servants had made our huts look very nice, and after lunch we went out to try the river; but the news was too true—the water was much too “heavy.” We returned home to dinner—and mosquitoes. Let me say at once that these torments are ever present, and are quite intolerable.

Saturday, July 1st.—Having no hope of salmon here, D. and Fred went off to the York River, where they had been invited to fish, and which is an earlier river than ours. I sat all day in mosquito-armor reading, Archie took charge of smudges, and occupied himself in various small devices for killing time, and at eight o'clock D. and Fred returned. D. had caught five salmon and a grilse, the average weight of the salmon being 24 lbs., the largest one 28 lbs. Fred had one salmon of 26 lbs., and a large trout of 5 lbs. His salmon had been foul-hooked, and took him two hours to kill.

Monday, 3d.—As it has rained again, and there can not be any fishing here for some days, we resolved to return to our comfortable and mosquito-less Druid. Archie and I came off in the morning, and in spite of the long ride I am quite glad to be away from those torments. D. and Fred went to the York. D. this time got one, and Fred five. The largest of his was 32 lbs., and all were over 23 lbs. It was quite late when we assembled on board again, and we had not finished dinner till nearly ten.

Tuesday, 4th.—The greater part of the fish yesterday had been caught at a pool called Miller's Landing, and as D. found we could drive over there quite easily, he suggested that I should try my luck. We started directly after breakfast, and three hours' driving and walking brought us to our pool. We immediately set to work, but not a rise was to be got, and I feared my expedition was going to be fruitless. We gave up this "good" place, and went lower down the river, and I very soon had the pleasure of a rise. I stood up in the canoe to throw the fly, and sat down to manage my rod when the fish was on, for it would be no joke to upset the boat in these swift rivers. I landed my victim with success, and he weighed 21 lbs. I tried once more, and caught another 24 lbs. D. and I then had lunch, and I returned home at four, while he fished on, and brought two more salmon home in the evening. Fred was fishing higher up the river, and we hoped he would have had a good day; but he had not a rise till five o'clock, when he came down to the place where we had been in the morning, and immediately had three. He got the third on, and was just happy, thinking it secure, when his reel broke, his fish went, and he had to come home.

We had a very jolly little dinner when we met again, and enjoy being comfortably on board after our experiences of the "Bush."

The owner of this river, with his party, caught fifty-seven salmon, averaging 23 lbs., the first week he was up here; but, hoping for more, he went a long way higher up to camp at the "Narrows," and we have just heard that after four days there they have only caught three salmon. Mr. Reynolds will regret this expedition when he sees what good fishing we have had close to his house.

Wednesday, 5th.—This was a lovely day, and we are assured that two or three days "of this" will set our river right. We went ashore "to shop," and D. visited two schools, and after lunch we fished for "Tommy cods." We all sat in a boat and fished over the side. The excitement was in the variety of the game—sea toads, blue fish, flat fish, Tommy cods, smelts. We brought home a bucketful.

Sunday, 9th.—We went to church in the morning, and in the afternoon took a most lovely walk. The weather was beautiful.

Monday, 10th.—This morning Fred and Archie started for the Bush, and D. and I went to fish the lower pools, intending to sleep here, and to follow them to-morrow.

D. went on foot, taking with him a little boy to act as guide. On the way, this boy told him that his father had been drowned two months ago, about twenty miles up the river, having slipped into a rapid as he was pushing some felled wood into the stream, and that his body had never been found. To-day, when fishing from a canoe, D. hooked a salmon, and the man had actually gaffed it, when it wriggled over the stern of the canoe back into the water. Knowing that the salmon was a dead fish, D. paddled slowly over the pools below. All of a sudden, as he was looking over the side of the canoe, he saw lying at the bottom of one of them, in about fifteen feet of water, the body of the poor man. It was in the same condition as on the day of his death, having been preserved in the ice-cold water.

I had a canoe and two men to myself, and began the day well by getting several rises and three salmon. I thought I was going to do wonders; but salmon-fishers are never sure of an hour's "luck." D. came from his pool to meet me, with four fish, and we landed, and were devoured by mosquitoes during lunch. I began again, and whipped the waters, without even a rise, till 6.30. On my way home I tried a new pool, and got fast to a salmon, which gave me very hard work and the greatest anxiety for half an hour, for we were on the brink of a very troublesome rapid, and I wanted to keep him away from that. Then some parts of the pool were very deep, and in others there were logs and traps of all descriptions; so that I never felt sure of my fish till he was landed in the boat. The salmon on our river are smaller than those on the York, but they are very strong and lively. This one kept rushing off with the line, and jumping up in the air so far from me that I could scarcely believe he was my salmon. D. had eight salmon, and I four—a great day's fishing.

Wednesday, 12th.—D. did not go out this morning, and sent in his stead our captain, a nice old man, who has never caught a salmon in his life. He returned at two o'clock highly delighted with a twenty-pounder he had landed, and which we have sent off to his wife.

Mr. Reynolds and Mr. Middleton, who left their river to-day, came on board, and had lunch before embarking for Quebec. Mr. Reynolds gave us his score, which I copy for the sake of those it may concern:—

General average, about 22 $\frac{1}{2}$ lbs.

We are rather afraid that, now we have come down, our fish have gone up the river.

Saturday, 15th.—I went up the river with D. and Fred to catch trout. D. was very anxious to make up his forty * salmon, but he was only able to capture a grilse. When we returned to the ship we dined, said good-by to all the men, and started for Tadousac.

Monday, 17th.—We were in sight of Tadousac about one o'clock, and immediately shrieked from our steam-whistle to report ourselves to the children. They came down to the beach to meet us.

Tuesday, 18th.—We keep Archie's birthday to-day, so a haycart, a buck-board, and a horse were ordered, and D. and I, five children, and Mademoiselle packed into the cart. Archie rode, and Fred, Mr. Dixon, and the provisions came in the buck-board. We drove to a place where there is a small waterfall and a mill, lunched there, stayed till it was time for a cup of tea, and then mounted our carts and drove "round the Concession." The buck-board broke down, and we had to borrow a cart. As the road home was very rough, the fun of the expedition consisted chiefly in the fearful bumps we got! All our plates and cups were smashed, and I felt much bruised and shaken; but the children enjoyed it immensely.

Thursday, 20th.—We left Tadousac to-day, and had to say good-by to Archie, who now goes to school in England—so the first break in our home circle is made. Parting with him took off rather from the distress of parting with the others; though even from them we shall be away some time. We left in a great shower and thunderstorm, and had to anchor some hours in a fog.

Ottawa: Monday, 24th.—Delighted to get to Rideau in the evening. Found the weather cool enough for fires.

25th-29th.—The week has been spent in arranging for our departure for the Grand Tour. A great difference of opinion exists as to what we shall want en route. Some say take provisions, others say don't. We decided, however, in the first place, to have a box made to hold plates, cups and saucers, knives and forks, tea, salt, etc. Then we take cases of preserved meats, a basket of eggs, some butter, Devonshire cream, and jam, and we have a refrigerator in our baggage-car. So we sha'n't starve, as we can add our own delicacies to the tough antelope steaks we are to get on the way.

Mr. Reynolds has taken the greatest pains about our comfort in the railway carriages. Fred Ward arrived Saturday night, so we are now ready for our departure.

CHAPTER XV.

ACROSS THE CONTINENT AND ALONG THE PACIFIC COAST.

Sunday, July 30th.—I must begin my account of this Grand Tour one day before its actual commencement, because upon this Sunday, when even our rugs were rolled up in their straps, and only finishing touches remained to be put to our piles of luggage, a blow fell upon us. Dr. Grant called to inform me that Mrs. Littleton was ill, and that in bed she must remain for at least ten days.

I went over to see her, and found her dreadfully disappointed, but a little comforted by the hope of following us when she recovers. To me, and indeed to us all, as a party, she is a great loss—she is always so cheery, and so ready to enjoy everything.

Monday, 31st.—We breakfasted comfortably, and went to the station at 10.30. There we were received by the Governor-General's Guards, and by a great many friends who came to wish us “good-by.” We have a whole Pullman to ourselves, and two “drawing-rooms”; these last are small, square cabins, where four berths can be made up. My lucky maid inherits Mrs. Littleton's, and as it can be opened into mine I also have some additional space. The three gentlemen—Colonel L. and the two Freds *—sleep in the Pullman, and we all live in it by day, when the top berths shut up and disappear, and the under beds turn into seats for four.

At Prescott we lunched in the station, and then returned to our "house-upon-wheels," and really began to live the life that is to be ours for seven days. Here I was introduced to the American reporter, a very nice young man, who comes with us to give an account of our tour in one of the New York papers. During the day he became so enthusiastic over the delightful prospect before us, that he made known to me, through Fred, his desire to invite a charming young lady of his acquaintance to share his enjoyment of the trip, assuring him that, if only I would lend her the shelter of my name, no more active chaperonage would be required of me; and that her mother—too delicate to undertake such a journey herself—would be perfectly satisfied with this arrangement for her daughter. He proposed, with my approval, to telegraph at once and to arrange for the girl to join our special train at some station on the way.—Hard-hearted, prim Englishwoman that I am, I felt obliged to discourage the scheme!

Our next amusement was our five o'clock tea. Mr. Reynolds had made us a most ingenious "portable kitchen," and we all sat and watched our kettle boil, and were extremely particular about scalding our teapot, etc. We had an excellent cup of tea, in spite of the watching and the number of cooks; so we set two proverbs at defiance with impunity.

I have a comfortable chair (between the railway-couches), and I sat in it, did a little work, read and talked till eight, when we reached Coburg, where we had supper or dinner, whichever you like to call it. The evening is the least pleasant part of the day; the light in the cars is not sufficient to read by, and we do not always feel inclined for games.

Tuesday, August 1st.—We slept pretty well, though often awoke for a moment by the unusual sounds and shakings. We crossed in our train to the American side by means of a ferry opposite Sarnia.

When we were dressed, and our carriage turned into its day condition, we got ready our breakfast; the public had theirs at Sarnia. A most excellent meal we had: fresh-boiled eggs, which Fred Ward superintended; tea, Mr. Reynolds's home-made bread, our own butter and Devonshire cream, potted meat, a cold chicken, raspberries, and jam! We enjoyed it all very much, which accounts for my telling you so much about it.

We were so warm and so dusty by the end of the day, that the sight of Lake Michigan, and the pleasant fresh air from it, as we passed close to it into Chicago, were very delightful. Crowds of people were bathing, and we longed to join them. When we arrived at the Palmer House Hotel, we were shown into the most gorgeous suite of rooms: a drawing-room with marble statues, satin curtains, embroidered chairs, gold and carving and pictures; a dining-room furnished with very pretty light wood, oh, so smart! a bedroom too splendid to sleep in, and with a magnificent satin cover over the bed; a bath-room off it, and a large room, with two "unique" beds in it, for a dressing-room. We settled into these magnificences as well as we could, but I think we rather agreed with my maid, who said that at the end of a long day in a train one did not feel inclined to be "bothered with so much splendor."

Wednesday, 2d.—The Count de Turenne breakfasted with us, and drove with us to the station. Mr. Palmer took a tender farewell of "Mr. and Mrs." Dufferin, as he called us, and Mr. Forrest and his daughters (old acquaintances) also saw us off, and I was introduced to Mr. St. John, the Globe reporter. The Chicago morning paper speaks of me as "Her Royal Nibess," and says that I do not wish my "hubbie to go and see the 'Nausty' man," Brigham Young. It also reports that we went to bed early to "save gas," and that "if our money holds out" we shall go to the Centennial.

We had rather a pleasant day: it was less dusty, some of the country very rich and well cultivated, vineyards to be seen, and nice little homesteads; we saw some prairie land, and in the evening stood outside our car to cross the Mississippi. There is a beautifully light bridge over it, 2,260 feet long. It is a sensation to see this river, of which one has heard so much; and a great river can't help being striking, but there is nothing grand in the scenery at this point.

We lunched and dined at stations, Burlington being the principal one at which we stopped. After dinner we played whist, and all agreed that we had got over the day very well. The people we have seen traveling so far get out looking very dirty and crumpled, and one is quite tired of the sight of brown holland; every one is attired in it; you might think it was a livery.

Thursday, 3d.—We had a very bad night—stopping so constantly it was almost impossible to sleep—and I was not, therefore, in good condition for trying the "hotel car," which was put on. There seemed to be an excellent meal provided; but the room was hot, and smelled of food, and I longed for our own little quiet breakfast.

At ten we reached Omaha, and crossed the Missouri—such an extremely muddy river, it excites no desire to bathe in it. Carriages awaited us here, and we drove up to our hotel, and chose our rooms; they really are very good for this last point of civilization, before the prairie begins.

D. and I took a drive to see the town, and we sat on the steps of the High School while he made a sketch of the view: low hills in the background, the Missouri twisting about through muddy-looking plains, and the small town in the foreground.

We took another walk later in the day, and saw our first Chinaman—a neat young man, all in black, with his coat cut after the fashion of his country. The streets of Omaha are very new, with bridges of loose planks between the footpath and the street, and the houses are low and square-looking; but there is a fine post-office.

The Mayor called upon D., and one resident Canadian presented an address.

Friday, 4th.—We left Omaha in the morning, and had a most delightful day. The weather was perfect: warm enough to sit with every window open, and yet fresh and pleasant; no dust, and a most exhilarating atmosphere. We are rising all day, going slowly over the Rocky Mountains; the train moves at an easy sort of jog-trot, and we thoroughly enjoy everything. We passed through the Platte Valley, the river Platte running at some distance from us all day. The scenery, if not beautiful, is interesting: a great sea of land, very flat, but with a good soil, and giving one an extraordinary idea of the capabilities of the country and of the room in it.

We lunched at Fremont, and dined at Grand Island. There is a difference of opinion as to the food at these stations. My idea is that it is excellent; the reporters and my maid think it is disgusting. This difference of opinion can be explained. If you require a meat dinner, you will find it bad; but I want neither meat nor wine, and can live upon the things which we get good everywhere: tumblers full of iced milk, good bread, butter, eggs, fish, and iced cream!—the latter, at the most unpromising-looking stations, rivals Gunter. We generally have a table reserved for us, and at Fremont a very smart negro, with a beautiful peacock-feather fan, brushed the flies away while we lunched.

Saturday, 5th.—We slept much better last night, and I did not even awake when we were stopped by—the grasshoppers! They get on the rails, and, being squashed there, oil them, so that the engine can scarcely pull the carriages along, as the wheels don't bite.

When we did awake, we found ourselves on the Rocky Plains, a delicious wind blowing, and not bringing the dust to us.

I got out at the station, where the people were breakfasting, and looked about—a scene of desolation; and yet when we look back from the train it does not appear so desolate: great plains of dull-colored grass, broken up by rocky mounds, which present a white appearance to the eye; in fact, a part of the Rocky Mountains. We have risen 3,600 feet since we left Omaha, and I suppose the delicious air makes everything appear couleur de rose. We have seen flocks of cattle, and four antelopes. The curious thing is, that you see cattle apparently quite near, but on consideration you realize that they must be very far away, as you can not make out the details; a man on horseback that you fancy quite close, looks like a stone moving. There are no trees or houses, or any object by which to judge distances, and the atmosphere is wonderfully clear.

This is very like being at sea: the wind whistles round the car, and the land round us is flat, with white-crested waves of rocky sandhills, while the air is most exhilarating. But I must not, under its intoxicating influence, fill up my journal with rhapsodies.

We lunched at Cheyenne, and were met there by the Governor of the territory, Mr. Thayer. There is a large hotel at Cheyenne, and it is "quite a place." After leaving it the scenery became lovely. First, we had the interest of the plain, with its little prairie dogs to watch, the gophers—a sort of ground-squirrel—and an occasional antelope; then the plain broke up into undulating hills and heaps of rock, a few scattered trees, and the magnificent range of Rocky Mountains, with patches of snow relieving their blueness, in the distance. Some of the “heaps of rock” look like ruined castles, for the stones are piled one upon another. The ground is much broken. Altogether, I think the views enchanting, and I breathe the air with pleasure. At Sherman we reached our highest point (8,263 feet), and soon after leaving it we went over a very awful-looking structure—a sort of skeleton bridge, without a parapet, across a ravine.

The wind, of which there is a good deal, blew off the lid of our precious kettle, but luckily we stopped a moment after, and it was rescued.

Sunday, 6th.—The scenery early in the day was ugly; sandy, desolate plains—“the Artemisian Desert,” it is called, or “the Alkali Plains.”

Breakfast and lunch, at Evanston, were served by “John Chinamen.” They wore clean white blouses, loose blue trousers, and stumpy embroidered shoes, their long pigtails twisted round their heads and fastened up. Their height, their dress, their hair, and their singularly mild expression, make them very feminine looking. At Evanston there were some very Indian Indians—hideous brown squaws, dressed in brilliant rags, waiting at the doors of the railway carriages for gifts of food, and a number of boys with arrows standing about with them. The Colonel set up a coin on a stick for them to shoot at, and one split the stick. He also knocked the cork off a bottle without touching the bottle.

The guide-book told us that after leaving Evanston we were to watch with “full breath and anxious heart” for the magnificent scenery now about to burst upon us as we pass through the Echo Cañon, or valley. Accordingly, we sat out on the edge of our baggage-car, and if we were a little disappointed at first, by the evening we were well pleased, and felt that we had really seen a most curious and (part of it) beautiful place. We came down hill through the valley, starting from a great upland of the Uintah Range of the Rocky Mountains. The railroad seems to divide the country into two parts, for on one side, rising immediately from the track, were green, sloping banks, while on the other were gigantic hills of rough, red stone, twisted and tilted and tumbled into every sort of strange form—castles and pulpits, monuments—all kinds of devices seemed to stand before us. We remained the whole afternoon watching the views develop as we passed the various points ; the beautiful part was when we distanced the details, and when the green and the red and the curious shapes become a broken mountain range, opening now and then to show us miles and miles of mountain and plain below.

For several hours we had a little stream close to us, and as the day became very hot, the river seemed most refreshing, and added a foreground of fresh green to the magnificent views in the distance. We passed the Thousand Mile Tree—1,000 miles from Omaha—and close to it “the Devil’s Slide,” a curious geological formation : two natural walls of rock down the side of a hill, with just sufficient room between them for “Him” to slide through.

A short time before we got to Ogden we came, as it were, through the Rocky Mountains, passing quite close to patches of snow, and looking back upon a very much more rocky appearance than the mountains have from the other side. Now, do you understand that from Omaha the country gradually slants upward towards these mountains, and that the railroad mounts to a height of 8,242 feet, after which it suddenly descends? Do you realize that now the rivers flow the other way, and that we have crossed the Great Range?

An American general came to have tea, or rather iced water, in our car, and stayed till we reached Ogden. We part from our car and our two conductors here. The guard (as we should say in England) and the porter —by name and by nature Mr. Brown—belong to this particular Pullman, and have been most attentive to us on the way; but the lines of railroad change here, and we have to get into another car.

We had arranged to sleep at Ogden, and on arriving there, at six, we visited our rooms. They were frightfully hot, for the weather is very warm. The village is in a valley, and there are stony hills straight opposite the house. This is on the way to Salt Lake City, and this place is almost full of Mormons; so, of course, when Fred and I took a little walk, we fancied every two women we saw together were colleague-wives, and every house to us seemed to have several entrances for the various ladies of the family.

Monday, 7th.—We had every door and window of our rooms open, and so spent a tolerably cool night.

All the morning we sat on the platform of the station. The thermometer was 99° in the shade. In the afternoon, D. and I went for a drive up the Ogden Cañon, the same thing, in miniature, as the Echo Cañon, through which the railway goes.

Our driver gave us much information as we went along, showed us the house of a bishop who owns eight wives and forty children, one of the wives busy clothes-washing at the back door. Our reporters went to Salt Lake, and interviewed Brigham Young. The American found that the Prophet had married a relation of his, for on hearing his name, and where he came from, Brigham Young said: "Oh, I must have married your father's sister, but I had forgotten all about the family." This reporter thinks no name bad enough to apply to his new relation.

Ogden has no time of its own, but keeps "East" time for one train, and "West" time for the other. A perpetual sum of mental arithmetic goes on, and we were constantly forgetting by which time we ought to go, and trying to remember whether the "left-hand clock" or the "right-hand clock" was ours.

We left in the evening, and found our new carriage very comfortable, though it has only one "drawing-room." We sat at the end of it—the last of the whole train—and passed by moonlight along the banks of the Salt Lake.

Tuesday, 8th.—We are going through the Alkali Plains, and the dust is dreadful: a large, rough dust covering everything in a second, and very painful to the eyes. As I write this my paper is like a plowed field, and, the wind being very high, one can only see a few yards for the clouds that surround the carriage.

The only thing that grows on these plains is sage, and a "sage-bush" here is the worst name one can apply to any vegetable growth.

Wednesday, 9th.—We got up at six this morning in California, the sandy desert changing into a mountainous district covered with pine and oak, parts of it laid bare like a great quarry by the mining for gold. As one looks back upon the country through which one has just passed, it seems perfectly impossible that the railway should really have made its way through such steep and perpendicular rocks, which seem more fitted for the Alpine traveler with his helpful stick than for an immense long train like ours.

The point of interest is "rounding Cape Horn." There is a "path" just wide enough for the railway round a precipitous rock, and one looks straight down upon the valley far beneath. This is very fine, but I find the skeleton bridges very trying to the nerves; one can see through them, and they make no attempt at having sides, and are so very weak-looking, and so high from the ground. Nowell expressed our sentiments when he kept saying, as we went over the last: "A very light bridge," "A very weak bridge," "We are over it," "A very good bridge."

The country now begins to look rich and park-like, and at the stations the most enormous peaches are offered to us at twopence apiece.

The Colonel was talking to a certain man on the train yesterday, and we hear that this morning the said man has been arrested for murder. He and others set fire to Chinese establishment, and shot the wretched people as they came out. The murdered were "only" Chinese, so it is supposed that a small bribe will get the assassins off.

We lunched, very badly, at Colfax, where there was a grizzly bear at the station, and then returned to our carriages for a hot, dusty afternoon. However, we felt that our long journey—of nine days—was near its end, and packed up the things in our "house-on-wheels" ready for our arrival at San Francisco.

Mrs. Littleton telegraphs that she can't come at all. I am so sorry.

Having washed off the dust, and made ourselves as smart as possible, we prepare to "land" at a small station called Oaklands. Captain Chatfield, the captain of H. M. S. Amethyst; Mr. Booker, the English Consul; and Mr. Walkem, a British Columbian, came "on board," and escorted us to our hotel. We got into a large ferry-steamer, which took us over to San Francisco. Our hotel is the "Palace," and is enormous; it is built round a court, which, by the way, is loaded with American flags; there must be at least five hundred of them hung about. Our rooms are very nice, smart and clean. We took a walk while our baggage was being brought up, and looked at some shop-windows; but oh! it was so cold. I had on my light "train" garments, and the wind blew through and through me. I saw many ladies in furs, and have now ordered out mine. The climate is treacherous—that is to say, that of San Francisco, for it is a promontory, and its climate is different from the rest of California. We went home after seeing some second-rate shops and quantities of Chinamen. We shall not be able to visit the Chinese quarter on this occasion, as the small-pox is very bad there.

Captain Chatfield, who has kindly made every arrangement for our comfort on board the Amethyst, dined with us, and we went to the play, and saw the "Geneva Cross." The theatre is a very good one, and we enjoyed the play; though I, at any rate, began to feel the effects of having risen at six and traveled day and night for many days.

Thursday, 10th.—Breakfasted in the enormous dining-room, and were very glad of a fire in our sitting-room. Received visits from Mr. Bradford, the artist; Captain Chatfield; and a lovely basket of flowers, with "Welcome to California," from an old North of Ireland friend.

At one o'clock D. and I, the Colonel and Fred Ward, drove off to see the sights. We went to Woodward's Gardens to see the sea-lions fed, but were too late for this, and so, after looking at an aquarium, we resolved to go at once to the Cliff House. This is a hotel over-hanging the Pacific, and is a great resort of the people here. To get to it you drive through the Park, a place which has been reclaimed from a sand-heap, specimens of the original desert being plentiful on all sides. Every morsel of earth has been carried to the spot; a beautiful road has been made, and trees and green grass are actually growing on this unpromising place. The balcony of the Cliff House, overlooking the Pacific Ocean, is charming. Close to the hotel there are some great rocky islands, upon which sea-lions are basking in the sun, and pelicans stand combing out their feathers.

I counted seventy-one sea-lions to be seen at once; some were dry, and of a real lion color, others which were still wet looked quite black. They made a noise very like that of hounds in a kennel, and it was most amusing to watch them climbing about the rocks, jumping in and out of the sea, and enjoying themselves generally. The pelicans, too, were flying about, and taking headers into the water. There was a haze in the distance, which prevented our seeing the land view. We lunched at this hotel upon its celebrated fare: oysters, "Porter-house steak," and omelet, and then drove home. San Francisco is built on the side of a hill, and everywhere there are other very steep hills, and our driver "beat" down some of them, going from side to side all the way. Most of the houses are built of wood, and have small gardens in front, and creepers growing up them; the streets are pure sand, and there are windmills for pumping water everywhere; you see ten or twelve of them in two or three streets.

One curious thing here is a car in which to go up and down hill without horses. There is an engine on the top of the hill, which winds and unwinds a wire rope, and this is attached to the carriages; as the rope is invisible, this unexpected movement of the carriages has an odd effect.

General McDowell, the hero of Bull Run, dined with us, and we took him to a special performance of "Brass" in our honor. We had a good box, and enjoyed that very ridiculous play.

D. and I took a walk, and on our return we found a most stanch old man from Killyleagh. He is connected with both our families, having been called Hans after D.'s grandfather, and having been taken on board my grandfather's ship when he was thirteen. It is extraordinary how he remembers everybody of that day—the very old times. He put me through such an examination as to my great-aunts, uncles, and cousins, that I felt some self-satisfaction at having passed it. He thought me like my family, but said the ancestors did not come out so clearly in Fred.

This man has been mining for forty-five years, and now declares that he is going back to the "old place" to buy a little property and die there. I dare say "going home" is a dream of his, and that he expects to start by every steamer; but the gold-fever is difficult to shake off, and, even if he does go, I fear matter-of-fact Killylaugh will be dull after years of Californian gambling.

This interview ended, we had to begin to prepare for departure. The gentlemen had to get into their uniforms, and there was great agitation over a missing bit of uniform, and a frantic rush to the tailor to make up the deficiency. We breathed again, and were all gloved, booted, and spurred, the luggage and servants gone, when I peeped into His Ex.'s room, and discovered an enormous bath-sponge unpacked! Fred and I were in despair over it; we ungloved, and wrung it, and squeezed it, and reduced it to its smallest possible compass, and then we did not know what to do with it. Could I in state, could he in uniform, carry a vulgar paper parcel? Could we march on board H. M. S. Amethyst with the consciousness of a damp, unwieldy sponge about us? No! drops of water oozed through the paper at the very idea. Happy thought! Push the sponge up into the arm of His Excellency's fur coat, and carry it so; "It might drop out just as the salute is being fired"; "it does look rather gouty for the arm of an empty coat, but still, what better place can we find for it?"

We carried out our brilliant idea, and were satisfied with our ingenuity. D. came in, and I told him that on no account must he put on his fur coat; but the despotic ruler of the Canadian Dominion declared that not for all the sponges of the sea would he consent to be cold with a fur coat at hand; and after all we had to submit to a vulgar newspaper parcel. It was lent the shelter of the fur coat at any rate till we got to the boat, was received with respect by a gentleman in uniform, was laid with care by His Excellency's side in the man-of-war boat, and was extricated during the voyage to the ship by one of his Aides-de-camp, who managed to leave it lying innocently upon the seat when His Excellency stepped on board the Amethyst, whence it was conveyed to the proper quarter by one of Her Majesty's seamen.

We sent two men-servants on by the mail steamer, so the party on board the Amethyst consists of D. and I, Colonel Littleton, the Freds, Miss Alexander* (my maid), and "John."

The captain has taken a large slice off his cabin, and divided it into two; if I were not afraid of using a wrong mathematical term, I should say that the slice is an equilateral triangle, that a small angle at the top or point is my maid's room, and that D. and I, two iron beds, and a large chest of drawers, inhabit the base of the said triangle. Captain Chatfield has been so kind in making everything nice—pictures on the walls, muslin-covered dressing-table, etc. We remain at anchor till the morning, and are, consequently, very bold and brave and perky, and dine below, and play whist and enjoy ourselves.

Saturday, 12th.—“A change comes o'er the spirit of my dream”; it appears to me that the Pacific is a nasty ocean. I get on deck, and lie and sit and doze all day; the men look pale, and are not in good spirits.

Sunday, 13th.—The Pacific is even a nastier ocean than I imagined, very much nastier than the Atlantic, and the Captain's cabin the least nice place one could possibly be in. The screw thumps and vibrates directly under it, and the pitching is longer, and in it one has to perfection that delightful sensation of being held in mid-air which is so very trying to the inner man.

Monday, 14th.—Got on deck, and lay in a cot swung under a tent of flags; every one better, but not well—not by any means. I should have felt very low about myself, had I not heard the Captain say that we “shipped green seas” nearly the whole way over; so I feel that I had a right to be ill. Alexander got very much upset by the screw, and I awoke in the night to hear her cry that she could not stay there, and to see her advancing into the Captain's cabin. D. helped her in there, and as the Captain did not awake, she lay herself down on the floor under his cot and slept.

Tuesday, 15th.—Things look better. I dress, and sit down and eat, and soon begin to walk, and to look about with pleasure. We coast all the way, and there are strange, dangerous, isolated rocks sticking up out of the sea. About three we arrive at Cape Flattery, and directly after passing it come to a narrow channel (ten miles) between Vancouver and the mainland. We have the sun, smooth water, and before us a splendid snow-capped range of mountains.

We reached Esquimault at nine, dropped anchor, and the screw ceased, so that we shall have a quiet night before encountering British Columbia. The mail steamer has not arrived, and they say we are twenty-four hours sooner than we were expected.

Wednesday, 16th.—After a peaceful night I came on deck, and found myself in a beautiful harbor, very small, but very deep; two men-of-war besides our own, gayly dressed with flags; flags and banners on land, beautiful mountains in the distance, charming weather.

The early morning was spent in waiting about, messages coming and going; some anxiety felt about the mail steamer, which is two days late; however, at twelve she arrived with our servants, who are announced as the "Hon. F. Nowell and the Hon. G. Dame, Aides-de-Camp to His Excellency." If they had arrived first, as they should have done, I believe they would have been received by the whole city.

We were to land at one, and at that hour the Staff went off in one boat, while we followed in another, and remained a short way from the ship while the salute was fired.

Then we stepped ashore, and were received by Sir James Douglas and a number of residents, and got into the carriage which was to drive us to Victoria. We grew into an enormous procession before we reached that city (it is three miles distant), numbers of carriages and riders joining us. At one point along the route there rode out from the wood a party of magnificently-dressed archers, such as you have not seen off the stage:

green-feathered hats, green velvet coats, breeches, big boots, bows, arrows—really very handsome-looking people. They formed an escort the rest of the way. Farther on we picked up a band of horsemen with red ribbons across their breasts—a company in green—bands—some militia—an army of small boys, each carrying a bright-colored flag—my “body-guard.” The men who wore the colored sashes saluted in a curious fashion, by putting the hand to the mouth. We went over two bridges, both ornamented with green and with various flags and devices, whence we saw a number of the Indian canoes, which here are shaped like gondolas, full of people, and covered with flags; the Indians were singing, and we were sorry we could not stop to look at them longer and to see them nearer.

Then we passed through the Chinese quarter of the town, and saw a number of the men and a few of the very funny little women. The Chinese put up their own arches, and they were very prettily designed; they hung up lanterns in some, and on one there was quite a houseful of little images. When we entered Victoria there was an address. D. replied from the carriage. At present the feeling here is British, but anti-Canadian, on account of the railroad, which can’t be made yet; so it is not all plain sailing. We were told that on one arch there was written, “Our Railroad or Separation.” The Governor-General was obliged to refuse to go under it, though he said he would do so if the “S” were turned into an “R”; and one man who found we were making a turn to avoid the street with the obnoxious arch jumped about as if he were mad, and when he met us above the arch he jumped again, and shrieked, “Three groans for Mackenzie!”

I think every one of the 5,000 inhabitants of Victoria must have been out in the streets, and we drove at a foot's pace to the Government House,* which has been lent to us during our visit here; the drive lasted two hours and a half.

When we got to the door, we stood while the procession passed, and D. had an opportunity of stopping a carriage full of Chinamen, and thanking them for their reception of him. At last everybody was gone, and we looked about. The house is very nice and comfortable: there is a good ball-room, small drawing-room, large billiard-room, and excellent bedrooms. We have a Chinese cook, who is, I grieve to say, highly British, having cooked for six Governors, but he is very good in his homely style; Ah Sâm is his name. Then I have a very comfortable sort of housekeeper, a housemaid with a Chinaman under her, our own four servants, a coachman, and a gardener—but I have had to write so much to-day that I will finish my description to-morrow. We were very tired at night, and were glad to go early to bed.

In the evening the Chinese quarter of the town was illuminated, and all their houses were opened; people went in just as they liked, and were given tea and sweet-meats.

Thursday, 17th.—This Government House is built on a rock, but a nice garden has been made; the drawback to it is the want of water. Every drop, both for house and garden, has to be brought in barrels; so there is not much to spare, and the grass is all burned up. From the windows there is a view of a magnificent range of mountains, a little wanting in variety of outline, but extremely high. Mount Baker stands by itself, and really is a very splendid sight. Between us and them there is the sea.

* The Hon. Mr. Richards, having been only recently appointed Lieutenant-Governor, had not yet occupied Government House.

D. interviewed people from ten till five. They are very angry with Canada, and he has hard work. About five I got him to come and take a little drive. We called on the Lieutenant-Governor — Mr. Richards — drove through the city, and as our drive was unofficial, went under the obnoxious arch, and round the “park,” Beacon Hill; from the coast-road there is a very fine view of the mountains. Captain Chatfield came to stay with us. There is a bright sun, but a cold wind. It seems to me a trying climate, and the many changes of temperature and food, and the long journey, have rather knocked me up.

Chief Justice Sir Matthew Begbie dined with us. He is a very big man, very amusing, and the whist-player of British Columbia; however, on this occasion D. and I beat him thoroughly. His mind was, I suppose, distracted, for I found afterwards that he had planned to serenade us, and had arranged for some young ladies to come up at 9.30 to sing with him at our windows; so he was all the time listening with one ear for the sound of wheels, while he was attending to the trumps with his eyes. At last D., who had just gone away to do some business, heard voices in the garden, and with well-feigned astonishment rushed in to tell me. We brought the singers in, and gave them tea.

Friday, 18th.—We had a dinner for the Lieutenant-Governor and his wife. The other guests were Mr. and Mrs. Bunster (he is the Dominion M. P.), Mr. and Mrs. Roscoe, Senator and Mrs. Macdonald, and the local Prime Minister, with his wife, Mrs. Elliott.

Saturday, 19th.—D. kept busy till within ten minutes of dinner-time. He is working very hard. At five o'clock I gave him up, and took the Commodore and the boys a drive. We went to the Gorge. The roads here are good, and the drives pretty.

In the evening we had a Drawing-room at the Parliament Buildings. The officers of the fleet helped to make a brilliant Court, and it was very largely attended, and was most successful. Six Chinamen came, and their names greatly tried the gravity of the A. D. C. who had to read them aloud.

Monday, 21st.—I walked for an hour with D., and the whole of the rest of the day he was shut up with various people. One deputation stayed from two till six. I was “at home,” and the Commodore helped me to receive my visitors, for Fred was deep in invitations, and the others were with D. In the evening we had a dinner—Mr. and Mrs. Trutch, Mr. and Mrs. Crease, Mrs. Grey, Mrs. O'Reilly, the Ministers Smith and Vernon, and the Mayor (Mr. J. S. Drummond).

Tuesday, 22d.—As usual, the morning was spent by D. in seeing deputations and visitors of all kinds.

We had an afternoon-party, and I received the guests in the garden. We had a band there, but in a very short time we adjourned to the house, and danced. D. was released about four o'clock, and was able to lead off the ball. Six Chinamen came, and looked on with great interest. The party broke up at 5.30, and we had a dinner, beginning at 6.30, and had afterwards to attend a concert held in the theatre.

Wednesday, 23d.—I have just received such a funny visit. Our cook, Ah Sâm, has been lately married, and said he would like me to see his wife; so she came this morning. The door opened, and in walked a Chinese lady, dressed in black satin, wearing bracelets and rings, and with her hair wonderfully done; and supported by her came a little creature with a baby face, who evidently could not walk alone on account of her tiny feet, her hair very much dressed, and ornamented with what appeared to be a cap of many-colored cut papers; she wore a blue tunic with embroidery on it, black satin petticoat, bracelets, and earrings, and had rings on her bits of hands. This was the bride. We got her into a chair, for she seemed at first incapable of even shaking hands without help, and for some time she appeared to be on the verge of tears, and half covered her face with a red silk pocket-handkerchief. It was a little embarrassing for us all. Ah Sâm kissed my hand, and brought in a tray full of presents : two packets of fireworks (which will be awkward to travel with), some gimcracks they use in their churches, a Chinese crépe handkerchief, and some shell frames. We looked at these and thanked him, and then he went away, and we began to talk to the bride, who by this time had somewhat recovered. She was really a very pretty little thing, with a bright complexion, pretty eyes and teeth; and she answered us very nicely in English, and quite understood D.'s jokes as to the respective merits of her hairdressing and mine.

Poor baby that she is, she has only been married a week, and has not known Ah Sâm, who is an elderly and very ugly gentleman, much longer. When leaving, she kissed my hand, and then made a set courtesy at the door, just like a child who had learned its lesson.

At twelve o'clock we went in carriages to see a regatta, which was to be held at the Gorge—an arm of the sea which spreads out like a small lake, narrowing at each end; its shores are rocky mounds and wooded banks, and on them there were knots of people in every direction. Across one end there was a string of flags, which, with the background of mountains, wood, and water, looked very gay ; a number of boats were dotted about, and arranged in three groups were twenty large canoes, filled with Indians, and covered from stem to stern with flags. It is impossible to conceive anything more brilliant than the scene was, with a bright sun shining over all. As soon as the Indians saw the Governor-General approaching, they set up an extraordinary howl, and jumped about, stamping and clapping.

We got into a man-of-war's boat, and rowed about among them, being greeted by each set with fresh contortions and acclamations. There were about seventeen people in each canoe. Most of them had their faces painted—bright red being the favorite color. Some had a streak across the face, others patches on their cheeks, some were almost covered with it. Some had down sticking all over their heads, and looked as if they had slept inside a feather-bed. They also wore colored handkerchiefs tied on in every sort of fashion, most curious to behold.

There were some excellent races, four or five of the large canoes in a race, the men rowing, or rather paddling with all their might—eighty strokes a minute—leaving quite a sea behind them.

There was, too, a most exciting squaw race. We rowed alongside most of the way, and saw the women well; one crew consisted of rather nice-looking young ones, but these did not win.

Many of the squaws wear handsome silver bracelets, and a certain young lady, Amanda by name, has promised to try and procure me a pair.

The Commodore came home to dine with us, and we had a party. We were obliged to dismiss our guests rather early, as we embarked after they left. We drove to Esquimault, and when we got into the boat the three men-of-war suddenly illuminated. At the end of each yard a blue-light burst into flame, and every port was lighted up; there were also some rockets.

Thursday, 24th.—I was awoke about seven by the thump, thump of our screw, and found we were again on our travels. We passed through the Georgian Bay, and had all day the most lovely scenery. One part of the time we were in a very narrow channel, and could almost touch the rock on one side. About four we reached Nanaimo, and anchored in its harbor. We went out to fish for salmon, and being unsuccessful, we stopped a fishing-boat to ask if they had caught anything, and the owner immediately introduced himself as a County Down man. He ran away as a boy, and now turns his hand to anything here. He pointed to a half-breed girl on board, who, he said, was his daughter; adding, "Of course, she's not like any of us, but she is a very good girl."

Friday, 25th.—Directly after breakfast we landed at Nanaimo; it is a small place, but the inhabitants gave us a very kind reception. A large square place was built up, and decorated with flags and evergreens, and at one end of it the school-children were placed. There was an address, and then a song, written for the occasion, was sung.

We went to the coal-mine, looked down it, and came on board our ship again.

We left at one o'clock, and proceeded on our journey north, reaching Tribune Harbor in three hours. The gentlemen rather expected to get some shooting, and directly we anchored every one appeared in sporting-clothes. D., the Captain, and I went in one boat, and landed where there was an Indian house. The inhabitants promised to show us grouse and deer, but directly they had put us in the track they went off at a gallop with their own guns, and we suppose they intended to kill a deer, and to bring it on board to sell.

We tramped on through the narrow path, climbing over fallen trees, our only pleasure being the beautiful view as we looked over the bay in which the Amethyst was anchored. When sunset was approaching, we turned back. D. and the Commodore had just unloaded, when three grouse rose, the first we had seen. One of them perched upon a tree, and sat there, so we said, "for the pot," and the Captain loaded and shot him; however, he was lost in the thick shrubs, there being no dog to find him. The rest of the party had no better sport, but they were much pleased with themselves for having bought some fish from an Indian; they found, however, upon their return to the ship, that they had purchased the refuse of what had already been offered on board, and that a great supply of better and cheaper ones had been laid in.

Saturday, 26th.—We started in the middle of the night, and when we came on deck in the morning we found ourselves in Bute Inlet. The scenery here for forty miles is perfectly lovely. The channel between the outer belt of islands and the mainland is narrow, and the water very deep. On every side rise high pine-covered hills, exhibiting the greatest variety of form and outline, and some of them capped with snow.

Unfortunately the weather was bad, and got worse every mile we went, so that sometimes we only saw the tops of the mountains for a few moments before the mist descended upon them and they were lost to view.

Bute Inlet is expected to be the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so the Governor-General came out of his way to see the harbor. The water is the most beautiful green. We saw several glaciers and cascades coming down the mountains. Directly we anchored we set out to fish. I never saw so many fish jump so very close to one before; however, they would not look at our tempting spoons, and we caught nothing.

On shore we saw the most picturesque figure. There was an Indian wrapped in a scarlet blanket, and with a conical hat on his head, perching upon a large stone, his arms clasped round his knees. He looked like an enormous robin redbreast. D. went to speak to him, and when he got up we saw that the red blanket was almost his only covering. He produced an old sock, from which he extracted with pride a written paper, signed by an English admiral, which informed the reader that this Indian was a decidedly bad character, but that he had behaved better than usual on some particular occasion.

He was in the act of making a "dug-out"—a canoe carved out of a tree—which lay on the shore in its unfinished state. D. looked into his hut—a miserable place open at two sides; a woman and three children, and a quantity of dried fish, were in it. We gave the man what tobacco we had in the boat.

Sunday, 27th.—Another misty and rainy day. We had a very nice service on board at ten o'clock, with good singing. We at this time were still in the Sound, and the scenery was very fine, but for about three hours in the afternoon we were in the open sea, and there were doubts whether we should not have to keep out to sea for the night, to avoid a very nasty bit of navigation in the dark: but the good ship Amethyst went very fast, and we had the pleasure of anchoring at eight in Safety Harbor, and having a quiet dinner.

We found our tender waiting us here.

Monday, 28th.—We started as usual about daylight, and again passed through narrow channels and most beautiful scenery. At ten we had some gun-practice, and saw shot, shell, and case fired at the rocks on shore. The latter is used for firing at boats, and as it leaves the gun it breaks up into small pieces, and powders the water all over with scraps; a boat coming off could scarcely escape being hit. The sailors equipped themselves for war, with swords and pistols, and the doctors prepared for broken legs and various wounds.

We arrived at our anchorage about four o'clock, and, as usual, this sporting community prepared to fish and to shoot. We were surrounded by steep, high, pine-covered hills, so Fred Ward, Mr. Rowe, and a half-breed determined to shoot for us a deer or a bear. The Commodore, D., and I went fishing, but another boat-load made for the little river before us.

The bear-hunters shot a goose, the large boat-load caught six trout, and the Commodore and D. took a tremendous walk through the bush, and succeeded in getting to the top of a very pretty waterfall, which stopped their farther progress. They saw tracks both of deer and of bear. It rained, and I remained in the boat, and did nothing.

Tuesday, 29th.—There is very little to tell of to-day, for the weather has been desperately bad—pouring rain, and much fog. We have seen nothing in the way of scenery, and had it not been for having our tender to pilot us into Metlacatlah, we should have spent the night at sea; however, here we are safe at anchor. I saw one little sea-beast to-day; it jumped clear of the water several times, and showed itself plainly—a sea-otter.

Metlacatlah is one of the most successful of Indian missions. It is entirely the work of a Mr. Duncan, who when he came here found the Indians in a most savage condition. He has lived entirely among them, and is regarded by them as their father and their friend. I hear that the influence he has, and the real good he has done, is wonderful.

We fired a cannon directly we arrived, and Mr. Duncan came off to see us. He is very pleasant—bright and enthusiastic, good and clever—quite a model missionary. Coming to these Indians in their most savage and debased condition, he has Christianized and civilized them; he has not only taught them their religion and the three R's, but has himself shown them how to build, taught them how to trade, to make soap, to sing; is their chief magistrate, and, as I said before, their father and friend.

He came to Metlacatlah from Fort Simpson with fifty Indians, setting up a new village on this spot; now there are eight hundred living here. When he first came the Indians were some of them cannibals, and all exercised the most horrible heathen rites and ceremonies, dressed in blankets, wore painted masks, had several wives, and knew no law. Now Metlacatlah is quieter than a white village of its size; the Indians themselves are police, and they form a council, which settles all their local matters.

Mr. Duncan amused us by telling us how he once bought a schooner to take furs to Victoria; he started as its captain, and his crew were Indians. Neither captain nor men knew anything about the sea, and the voyage is a most difficult one, and somewhat long, for they were out a month.

Wednesday, 30th.—It was delightful, after yesterday's rain, to find a lovely morning, and to see the beautiful scenery of this place to perfection; but I must tell you to-day about our visit to the Indian village of Metlacatlah.

We started in boats directly after breakfast, our Staff being dressed in red, to please the Indians. As we approached the shore they (the Indians) fired off two cannons, and when we landed we found a very respectable guard-of-honor ready to present arms; a boarded place had been prepared on the grass for us to stand on, and round it were all the inhabitants of the village.

They had received no notice of our intention to visit them before our arrival last night, so the greater part of the inhabitants were absent on their summer fishing-tours, and we only saw about a hundred. These, instead of being scantily clothed in blankets, were all—men, women, and children—remarkably well dressed, the men in cloth clothes, the women in neatly made prints, with bright-colored handkerchiefs on their heads and shawls over their shoulders. They and everything we saw here were quite Dutch in their cleanliness.

Mr. Duncan presented me with a silver bracelet, made for me by the Indians, and two silver napkin-rings. He gave D. a lynx robe and a beautiful black wolfskin, with its head and teeth perfect. The animal was shot outside his door in the winter.

His assistants, Mr. and Mrs. Collinson, gave us some spoons carved out of horn, Indian rattles, and a carved box with a set of teeth, and green eyes staring out of a face on its side; so I had quite a cargo of gifts. Mrs. Collinson teaches the girls and trains them for servants, or rather for wives. We next saw the "Council Room," and in it a peculiar fireplace, which they have in all the cottages, and which D. would like to put into some large hall somewhere. It is a good-sized square, in the very center of the room, with the chimney directly over it. Every one in the room is thus able to get an equal share of the fire, and it looks most cheerful with people sitting all round it.

In this room Mr. Duncan and his Indian colleagues carry on the business of the place. Outside, there are gymnastics for the boys.

The Prison stands opposite; it is a funny little tower, painted black below and white above. It is divided into two rooms, the "black" prison being more disgraceful than the "white." On the top of this building there is a stand for the band! The Church comes next, and is quite new, having been built entirely by Mr. Duncan and the Indians. It is 120 feet long by 60, and is 50 feet high; it is made of cedar and cypress, and is, I suppose, the only building of the kind to be seen anywhere made by people so lately savage. It holds 1,200 people, and is very handsome inside. Of course it is made of wood, and is perfectly simple, but the proportions and the simplicity together give quite a grand effect.

The School is another very good building, and round its walls there are texts and pictures. The pupils all learn to read English, which they prefer for reading to their native tongue—their own words are so very long. They translate what they read into Tschimchyau.

Mr. Duncan has succeeded in educating them up to the idea of having separate bedrooms, and houses to themselves, instead of living five or six families together in one room; and the first of his new houses has just been put up. We went into it, and were received by the master and mistress; the former presented me with one of the masks they used to wear in their dances. The house was very nice, the floors and part of the walls covered with a kind of native matting.

After making the tour of the village we returned to the platform. The people collected round, and sang "God save the Queen," and some English songs, and then a song about Metlacatlah, composed by Mr. Duncan, and set to the air of "Home, Sweet Home"; also some English and Tschimchyau hymns. An Indian then read an address in English, and the chiefs signed it in our presence. D. replied, Mr. Duncan taking down his speech, and translating it afterwards. He speaks their language perfectly, while many Englishmen only learn a jargon called Chinook, which is a sort of "pigeon English," intended for trading purposes, and quite unfit to explain the mysteries of a new religion.

Close to the wharf there is a large, empty room, which is used for stray Indians who arrive here, and who may have sickness among them. Mr. Duncan has put up a saw-mill, and I think I told you the Indians make soap; the traders used to ask them a dollar for a piece the width of a finger! This manufactory is not working at present, and the Indians came off in canoes to the ship, and asked for soap, instead of money, for furs. Great exchanges were made by the men on the ship—furs for old clothes.

We were obliged to leave this most interesting place at one o'clock, as we were to visit Fort Simpson, the most northern station of British America on the Pacific coast.

We went there in our tender, the Douglas. Fort Simpson borders on Alaska, and that country lay before us as we entered the harbor. The view from the Fort is most beautiful.

Unfortunately, the Governor of the Fort and the missionary were both away, and few of the Indians were at home. Most of them are Christians here, but they are not nearly so civilized as at Metlacatlah.

The Fort is surrounded by a sort of inclosed court, and Mrs. Crosby, the missionary's wife, took us through the village, where we saw for the first time some extraordinary monuments put up to Indian chiefs. The subjects are, I suppose, symbolical, but to us they appear grotesque.

The most curious one we saw was an enormous bare pole, on the top of which was carved and painted in gigantic size a grinning head. The body was that of a bird with its wings spread out, and on each wing and on its breast a naked baby or imp; underneath was nailed a long cloth apron ornamented with buttons. Another pole had a dog at the top and a queer face carved below. These poles are said to cost the Indians about £300 apiece—that is to say, they will give away blankets to that amount for the privilege of putting one up.

We went into some of the houses; they consist of one very large room, with the square fire in the center, the rafters being made of the most enormous trees. His Ex. spoke to the Indians, and they made a reply, which Mrs. Morrison (who is a half-breed) translated.

We had a very short time to stay here, and were soon in the Douglas again, on our way back to Metlacatlah. Mr. Duncan and Mrs. Collinson dined with us. An Indian chief came with them in order to present D. with the hat his father used to wear in the feasts and dances. It is three feet high, made of strips of thuja-bark plaited together, and jointed so as to sway about with every movement of the dancer. The man valued it very much, and Mr. Duncan told us that, although he has known him for years, he never saw the hat before. He says many of the others had presents ready for us, but we had not time to go to the houses.

Thursday, 31st.—We were to have started at day-break, but there was a thick fog, which only lifted at 9.30; after that the day was beautiful, and we had a splendid passage over to Queen Charlotte's Islands. I suppose this is the wildest place I shall ever be at. It is solely inhabited by Indians, and as yet there is no missionary among them; but Mr. Collinson is coming here from Metlacatlah.

We anchored opposite a village which, in the distance, looked like a forest of bare poles. These poles are heraldic, and are the monuments to chiefs that I told you of before. Every house seems to have one—and, as I think I said, they are highly valued—as symbols of rank. Some are carved the whole way up with grotesque figures and faces, some are painted; and in many houses the door is a part of the pattern of the pillar, and is an oval hole, through which you see the picturesque Indian figures appearing. When a man dies, his friends destroy his house, leaving the framework and the pillar, and make a little hut for the dead body to lie in, with a blanket nailed before it. We saw one with two canoes outside, ready to take the owner across the "silent lake." On one house were two figures with tall hats and frock-coats—missionaries evidently.

Friday, September 1st.—D. and the Commodore started at six in the morning, with some Indians, to try and get a bear, but they saw nothing. The Freds and I went to a little trading settlement, where an American is buying oil. The Indians were in tents and lying about the shore; the day was lovely and warm, and we had great fun bargaining, buying silver bracelets and carved bowls from them. They have a market at Victoria, and ask a good deal, but the American knew what we ought to give; and when we came back to the ship, and exhibited our bracelets to an Indian who was trading here, he did not seem at all pleased, and would not let me have another bracelet which I wanted so cheap. It was so amusing on board to see all the buying and selling going on, furs and bracelets, old clothes, soap, tobacco, and biscuits being exchanged, while hideous faces, painted black or red, looked up from the canoes.

The people here all seem to paint their faces, and they wear blankets, which they, unfortunately, buy white, so that they are generally very dirty-looking. D. is rather sorry now that he did not stay and see more of the fun here. He returned at 2 P. M., and we are off again. You may see by my writing that the screw is at work.

Saturday, 2d.—We had beautiful weather, and were able to enjoy the evening; but the night was somewhat rough. A fog this morning, and many doubts as to whether we could go on at all, or whether we should have to go out to sea—a very unpleasant prospect. We had just turned back, when we met our little friend, the Douglas, and, as she draws less water, she undertook to show us the way. We were off Vancouver Island, and wanted to pass between it and the mainland. The fog came on very thick, and we lost sight of the Douglas, and stopped again; then the mist suddenly lifted, and we were immediately able to go on at full speed—a great delight and relief to us all.

There are two things I forgot to say about the Indians. One is, that at Metlacatlah they are rapidly increasing in population, whereas in most other places they are diminishing in numbers. Then, I don't think I told you about the hideous way in which many of the old women have their lips stuck out, by means of pieces of wood, which are put in when they are babies, and changed for larger bits as they grow old; so that sometimes the tablets are the size of a spoon, and are used as such. In the case of too hot a morsel, it is laid down upon this convenient dumb-waiter, and is tipped up into the mouth when cool. Other women have a hole in the lower lip, through which a silver pin appears; this is a movable ornament.

The fog this morning detained us so long that we found it impossible to get to the harbor, in which we had intended to stop the night; so it was suddenly determined to anchor in Alert Bay, which we accordingly did. We had an hour to spare before dinner, so we landed to see the Indian village there. We found a great number of people, sitting in front of their houses —large buildings, with whitewashed fronts. They were wrapped in blankets, with handkerchiefs tied round their heads. We walked straight through them to the last house, which was the chief's. Oh, the smell! This house had a very Egyptian-looking painting in black all over it, and when we went in we found a great square room, with fires in three corners, and three sets of people sitting round them. In the center was a wooden figure of a man, holding out his hand to welcome visitors. We went up to one group and saw the chief, who, however, appeared to be stupid; and his son was lying on his back playing an accordion. The other people were eating berries and flour-and-water round the fire; they showed us some masks, but did not appear much interested in us, though they had fired off two cannon on our arrival, and had whitewashed their houses on the chance of our coming.

The trader who lives there soon explained it all. They had been having one of their most savage orgies, and had been singing, dancing, and feasting for six days. This very morning their "medicine-man" had been out on the rampage, and in his tantrums had bitten six people. On these occasions he rushes out of the house naked, and all the people are bound to run away; but, if caught, they stand still to be bitten, as they consider it a great honor. The trader said: "If you had come two hours sooner you would have seen the most terrible phase of savage life"; but I don't think we should, for the moment the man-of-war came in sight they quieted down, hid their drunken people, and allowed their medicine-man to escape into the woods.

Drink is at the bottom of much of the misery. In Canada there is a fine of $500 for selling spirit to Indians, but here they get it from American traders.

Sunday, 3d.—We had a lovely day, and after morning service went through the last danger on this route—the Seymour Narrows. There are several whirlpools formed by a rapid tide in this very narrow channel, and an American man-of-war was lost in them not long ago.

We anchored in Tribune Harbor, and took a nice walk over the cliffs, returning in time for dinner.

Monday, 4th.—This is the last day of our voyage in the Amethyst.

When we arrived at Burrard's Inlet we saw the Rocket, and the sight of her told us that our mail was in. Not having heard for a long time, we were all delighted. In the evening, by another steamer, two more mails arrived, and when I went to bed I had quite a headache from reading letters. I had forty myself—so many from the children, etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

BRITISH COLUMBIA, CALIFORNIA, AND THE SALT LAKE CITY.

Tuesday, September 5th.—The repose of a sea-life is over; posts and telegrams, addresses, replies, arches, bands and salutes are alive again.

Almost before we had finished our breakfast we were hurried into boats, and put on board the Douglas, and in her we steamed along for an hour, reading up the news in the papers. Later we got into boats and canoes, and landed in the bush, where we went to see a great tree cut down. Our time being short, our host, Mr. Raymur, had chosen a tree near the water, and he made many apologies for its small size; but as it was 250 feet high, and about six feet in diameter, we thought it enormous. It had been partially cut through, and we stood by to see its overthrow. Two men were working at it. They stood each upon a spring-board, on either side of the tree. These boards were narrow planks stuck into holes about twelve feet up the trunk (for they say the lower part of the trunk is too hard to repay the labor of hacking through it); the spring-board gives the workman great power with his axe.

In about ten minutes the monster began slowly to bend to one side, and then a crashing and a great thud upon the ground announced its downfall. According to its rings it was 400 years old, and planted in the reign of King Edward IV.

We set off again in our boats to the Amethyst, where we had a lunch still more hurried than the breakfast. The Douglas towed us in the ship's boats, and as we went very fast, and the water was full of pieces of timber, we had quite an exciting voyage, trying to avoid a blow from one of these.

We landed at a wharf, and got into carriages, which took us eight miles over a corduroy road through the primeval forest. Our destination was New Westminister, and when we arrived within the precincts of the city we were met by the Mayor, a guard of honor, and a band, and passed under arches decorated with flags. There were some very pretty devices, and two rather amusing ones. D.'s motto was very happily combined with the great political question of the day—"which route the Pacific Railway is to take"—"Per Vias Rectas, The Fraser Valley." Another had "Speed the Railway" written upon a board, above which a little train moved along as we passed.

We had a short way to drive, and turned up a grass hill, at the top of which a series of platforms were arranged, covered in with flags, and decorated with evergreens; the view over the Fraser River, the town, and the distant mountains was quite beautiful. The whole town was out, and there was besides a great assembly of Indians. After various varieties of white men had presented addresses and been replied to, and after numbers had been shaken hands with, we looked down the hill, and saw a mass of flags marching up; the bearers of these gay banners were all Indian chiefs, or great men, followed by a set of Indian Volunteers, who had got themselves into a very smart blue uniform, and were commanded by the owner of an old red coat and a pair of epaulets. The chiefs formed into a circle, while the army remained in a column, and stood facing the platform.

D. went down and shook hands with the chiefs, and then returned to the platform and listened to the speeches of four of them, every sentence of each being translated by an interpreter into English.

When it was his turn to reply, D. spoke one sentence, which was taken up by five interpreters, who each, in turn, put it into some new Indian tongue. The process was long, but it was interesting. These poor people have been waiting here for the Governor-General for nearly three weeks, and have taken great pains to get themselves up for the occasion.

There was lunch in a tent, and after it we walked down to the river, and saw three very good canoe-races. One set of boats had twenty-one Indians in each. At six o'clock we made a move to go to the steamer upon which we sleep. On our way we passed under a Chinese arch, and got out of the carriage to speak to some of the people about. After parting with the officials, we amused ourselves in our own fashion, and seeing a great sturgeon at a fishmonger's, we went in to look at it; he showed us more than a hundred salmon he had in store, and asked us if we should like to see some caught that night; which invitation we accepted.

D. had a long talk with various gentlemen on business before dinner. After it we stood on the roof of our drawing-room on the steamer to see a most beautiful torch-light display by the Indians in canoes. We steamed up a little way, and then back, the canoes following, their torches looking very brilliant in the darkness and reflected in the water. Some men on foot, also with torches, ran along the banks, and the town was illuminated. Before the lights disappeared there was cheering, and "God save the Queen."

After this we retired into private life, and prepared to go out fishing. Conducted by our friend the fishmonger, Mr. Herring, we got into a boat, Mrs. Herring coming with us to do the honors. We followed Mr. Herring, who, in a second boat, put down a great net, which we saw him take in. We caught six fine salmon and a sturgeon, and it really was great fun. When we landed we walked under the Chinese arch again, and were amused by their lanterns, which had little animals going round and round inside, jumping and moving their legs—so cleverly managed. Sir Matthew Begbie joined us here, and goes with us for some way. All glad to get to bed.

Wednesday, 6th.—Our steamer started at night up the Fraser River. She is a stern-wheeler, and has capital accommodation.

The scenery of the Fraser is lovely. I am quite tired of writing this, and it is impossible to convey an idea of the luxe of beautiful views there is in this country. Until we reached Yale the only event of the day was to be called out to see some magnificent one. We stopped a few minutes at Hope, a charming little place, and got to our destination—Yale—in the afternoon. A coach-and-six (in which we travel for a week) took us up to Mr. Oppenheim's house, where we are to sleep. On the way we stopped to receive a Chinese address, written on pink paper, and an Indian one. The decorations were wonderful for such a small place; the most original being a live horse, which was placed in the way, with a cloth over it, on which was written, "Good, but not iron," in allusion to the celebrated railway.

The Oppenheims had a banquet for us, cooked by a Frenchman from Victoria—very good, but so plentiful that Nowell managed to suppress some dishes behind the scenes.

Mrs. Oppenheim, though French, is like a motherly English woman, and I liked her very much. They have a very nice house and no children, but have a nephew living with them, and I was so surprised when I asked her what profession the young man was ; she said "a blacksmith." He did not dine with us, but with the servants, who did not know who he was until my maid discovered his photograph hung up in my bedroom.

Thursday, 7th.—After breakfast we started on our journey. Unfortunately, it rained on and off all day, but except that the views would, most of them, be prettier in sunshine, the wet was not sufficient to damp our enjoyment. Just before leaving, an Indian woman brought me a pin made of a gold nugget.

We set off in a large carriage, which held six inside and three on the box ; the servants had gone before us, and D. and I, the Commodore, the Chief Justice, the Colonel, and the Freds, went in this coach, drawn by four horses. We had forty-four miles to drive, and the road is a wonderful piece of engineering : a wall of rock on one side, and a great precipice upon the other, almost the whole way, with every now and then a sharp turn round some fearful bluff, where, looking forward, the road seemed to end, and there was nothing but the river to be seen, a hundred feet below. We were following the Fraser all day. The river itself is muddy, but very rapid, with mountains almost precipitous on either side.

It was very curious to see the little Indian fishing establishments on the way. Wherever there was a rock rising a little above the water, there you were sure to see a scaffolding, upon which were hung rows and rows of dried fish, and near it a sort of spring-board jutting out into the water, upon which a man stood over the stream, and dipped a net, shaped like a snow-shoe, into it ; we saw one man bring up a large trout, and cheered him from the carriage. Another curious thing we saw was a sort of house in which the Indians winter.

A large hole is cut in the ground, and covered over with a round roof; in the top of this there is a hole, through which a notched pole is stuck, and by this the people go down—and through it the smoke comes up.

We lunched at a place called Boston Bar, and D. took several portraits of Indians there. They were a different type from those we have seen before: instead of very fat faces, they have thin ones, and large, but not coarse, mouths. As we approached our camp we saw a most beautiful mountain view; down the sides of the precipitous hills there were streaks of light green, the rest being very dark fir; light clouds of mist floating about, and the river, far below, flowing rapidly along. We got out at one place to look at Hell's Gate, where the Fraser rushes through a very narrow pass. We passed several teams of sixteen oxen, and some with twelve mules, drawing two wagons fastened together.

When we arrived at our sleeping-place, which had been arranged by Captain Layton, a village came in sight! Our tents are on the side of a hill, 800 feet above the river, and when we walked up the little path made to them, we found a large dining-room tent, carpeted, the walls hung with chintz, and ornamented with green; and out of this my bedroom, fitted with every luxury! Outside the dining-room a row of ten tents—one for each gentleman, to sleep in—and a public dressing-room.

A great camp-fire is burning, the Chinese cook is at work at another fire, and a lovely view lies before us.

I was a little tired after the long journey, and was very glad of the good dinner we had. After it we sat round the fire; the Indians joined the circle, and passed a stone pipe from one to another.

I have retired from the fire to write this, but it is impossible to do justice to the day so hurriedly. I have not mentioned a waterfall, perfectly straight, down an enormously high cliff. The road really is rather awful, and I got great credit for my courage in driving over it.

Friday, 8th.—We breakfasted in our spacious camp at seven o'clock—to the tune, alas! of a pattering rain—and in half an hour set off on our drive. The rain kept on all day more or less, the weather luckily being least wet at the most important moments. The road was, I thought, rather worse than before, being equally precipitous and narrow, and much softer and more slippery-looking. Before we reached Lytton we met a great assembly of Indians, who had built an arch close to a little church they have there. There were about 500, of whom 200 men and women were on horseback; numbers of foals were following, and the neighing and excitement among the horses was as great as that among the men. An Indian had met us about three miles from the town, and said, “Tayee?” (chief). “Yes,” was the reply from our carriage, and off he started on his way to tell them we were coming. Such a motley and picturesque assembly: every sort of color and dress; curious caps, made of handkerchiefs tied on in every possible way; fur caps, made apparently of a whole animal, though some were merely a strip of fur tied round the head; and every face a study. The women rode astride, but had a blanket so neatly laid over the knees, and tucked into the stirrup at each foot, and sat so well, and were so much at home on their saddles, that they looked charming. Sometimes there were two on a horse, and many a mother and child sat together on one. The men’s saddles were often a good deal ornamented.

The missionary read an address, and “God save the Queen” was sung in Indian. We visited the church, and shook hands a good deal, and then rode on, the troop after us, to Lytton, where D. ordered beef and flour for the Indians. Here the whites had an address and an arch, and we stopped a few moments.

After we left it the Indians followed for some way, and we handed out tobacco to the women who came nearest, young and old being glad of it.

You can't think what a pretty sight it was! We were two large coaches-and-four, and a great procession of these curious riders, talking and laughing, following after us. Their horses are very small, but very good, have plenty of work, and are never ill. Just before lunch we met another, smaller troop of horse-men and women; one girl, with a yellow handkerchief on her head, was very tall, and looked very handsome as she rode along.

We have now left the Fraser River, and are on the Thompson. I must tell you about some Indian graves we saw on the way. One was a lean-to shed, under which the body or bodies were laid, and in front of the grave were three tin pans; outside the shed, facing the road, stood three wooden figures, a man and two women, dressed up in the clothes of the deceased. On a tree close by hung a quantity of horse-skins. When a man dies, his friends eat a few of his horses, and hang up their skins, so that he may ride upon them to the Happy Land. Another grave we saw was surrounded by a paling, inside of which was a figure of a woman, dressed, a small cross by her side.*

We arrived at Mr. and Mrs. Cornwall's house after a twelve hours' drive, and in a pouring rain, rather tired. I am sorry to say Mr. Cornwall is not at home, having most unfortunately had a very bad accident on his way here to prepare for us. His horse shied on the road over which we have just come, and he went over a precipice, happily in one of the least dangerous places to be found on the way. He broke his leg, while his companion rolled down twenty-five feet, and escaped with a few scratches. Mr. Cornwall had to be taken back to Victoria to have the leg set. Mrs. Cornwall has a very young baby, and her brother and sister-in-law are helping her to do the honors. They have made D. and me very comfortable in their house, and were most kind. The rest of the party are lodged elsewhere.

Saturday, 9th.—We left the Cornwalls' before 10 A. M., and again embarked in our coaches. At last the sun shone upon us, and we were able to dismiss from our minds all thoughts of umbrellas and waterproofs. The country here is very curious: there are low hills and rolling plains which to a stranger look barren, but which really support cattle all the year round, and certainly produce the best beef and mutton I ever ate. One carries away from this district the idea of a great sandhill of a yellowish tinge, cut into terraces, valleys, mounds, and apparently carved all over by ancient watercourses. Could it be irrigated, the land would be very valuable; but as it is there is scarcely any cultivation, and the only crop is bunch-grass. Though it produces such good beef, I can't tell you how many acres it requires to feed one cow, and the animal has quite a walk to take between one tuft of grass and another.

We had not left our starting-point long when all the colors of the rainbow on horseback appeared before us, and, with shouts and drums and neighing of horses, we were surrounded by a cavalcade of Indians. The next half-hour was one of the greatest excitement. I never saw anything so delightful as the sight of these men, women, and children, waving their flags, horses and foals galloping up and down the low hills, around us, while our two coaches drove steadily along the road.

Some of the figures were most interesting to watch. There was one man with a square drum, which he beat as he galloped along, his legs keeping time, and his body dancing on the saddle. The chief was a remarkably handsome old man, with a majestic air and a fine seat on horseback. He wore a red uniform, and the whole costume was, strange to say, complete, and unspoiled by any vagary of his own taste. Another wore a blue coat, deer-skin leggings, and a fur cap, and carried a scepter mounted with silver. Several women had babies before them, and bigger children tied on behind; and you may imagine how the baby's head wagged as its mother galloped along! The people ride splendidly, and I did so enjoy seeing them scampering over the ground.

After much cantering and skirmishing we arrived at an inn and a shop, where we got out of the coach to speak to the people, and to buy them flour, sugar, and tobacco.

These Indians are very bright and intelligent-looking. We shook hands with a great many of them, and particularly admired the "British General"—the handsome chief I told you of. I looked to see if the babies' heads were all right, and I found one poor old lady who had been galloping along in this furious fashion with her hand and arm swelled with rheumatism. I got her a warm shawl at the store. The whole assembly followed us a mile or two farther, when they collected on the top of a small hill, waved their flags, and disappeared. Four of them—a woman and three men—came on the whole way to the Lake.

After passing through arid plains, we suddenly came upon a glassy sheet of water, into which, and out of which, the river Thompson flowed. We got on board a steamer, and as usual found every comfort and luxury surrounding us: pictures in our cabins, books of poetry on the tables, rocking-chairs, and good beds.

We steamed along for three hours, when we arrived at Kamloops. On one bank of the river we saw a quantity of white men and Indians on horseback, and just as we were going to land our attention was called to the other bank (we had got into the Thompson), where about five hundred wild horses were being driven down to the water. D. landed, and drove up in a carriage-and-four to a platform, where he found me (I having walked up) and some other ladies. The platform was close to an arch, and the carriage was surrounded by all the people on horseback. I was presented with a bouquet by a young lady who had been a school-girl at Clandeboye when I was married. She and some aunts and uncles live here, and our meeting was quite exciting.

There were addresses, etc., and D. went a short drive, and then returned to the steamer, where the Indians followed him, and stood on the banks chanting a sort of psalm.

A deputation kept His Excellency for some time, and Ah Sâm (our cook) got so impatient, and so fearful that his dinner would be spoiled, that in spite of every one he sounded a gong (upon a tin pan), as a hint to the people to go.

I must tell you that a lady at Kamloops was warned in a dream to give me a beautiful pin, made of a nugget (not the one I mentioned before), which she accordingly did.

Sunday, 10th.—We had prayers before breakfast in the cabin, and soon after steamed across to the opposite shore to visit the Indians.

There was rather an interesting "Pow-wow." They have had a land grievance in this province, which is serious to them, and they set it before the Governor-

General in a very grave and dignified manner. They seemed pleased to have the opportunity of seeing him, and, although he made them no promises, I think they felt that they had secured a friend at court. The conversation over, D., Fred, and Colonel Littleton mounted some of the Indian horses in order to visit the Reserve, and although they did not find the Mexican saddles at all comfortable, they enjoyed their ride very much. "Louie," the chief, showed them all his carrots, onions, potatoes, etc., and, once the "Pow-wow" was over, became very cheerful, and made them gallop along at a great pace.

They returned for lunch, and afterwards rode again on the Kamloops side of the lake. D. got a long way up the hill, and had a good view of the country, and the remainder of the party walked. Mr. Dewdney and Mr. Vernon dined with us.

I must tell you a story of Ah Sâm. Captain Layton had slept on shore last night, but as we start very early to-morrow he wished to have a cabin in the steamer, so he said to Ah Sâm: "You take your mattress, and put it on the floor somewhere, as I am going to sleep here to-night." "Oh," says Ah Sâm, "me workee hard, Captain Layton no work; me want good bed; if Captain Layton get in first, he have it; if me get in first, me have it." So at nine o'clock the whole saloon was disturbed by the snores of Ah Sâm, who retired very early indeed to make sure of keeping the bed. He is a great character, and always takes his boots off in the coach, lest he should be made to walk up the hills.

Monday, 11th.—I was awoke by the stern-wheel, which is immediately behind my cabin, and which shakes one more than any screw. We were starting, and about seven we stopped at a place where most of the party landed to shoot; the steamer went on, and the Commodore and I breakfasted at nine, and went out fishing at Savernagh's Ferry, in the Thompson River. The trout were only just beginning to rise when the steamer whistled for us, and we had to go back. The sportsmen had had a beautiful walk, and brought home five and a half brace of the "sharp-tailed grouse," and we all enjoyed our morning very much.

We embarked at noon in our coach, and parted with the Chief-Justice at Câche Creek, on his way to Cariboo. I then got on the box (or "fore-top," as we call it, having just come from the Amethyst) to see Mr. Tingley drive: this was an easy part of the road, so I thought it a good place to take a front seat.

We got to Mr. Cornwall's at six, and all dined there, D. and I remaining to sleep. We had a most lovely day.

Tuesday, 12th. — We got away early; a beautiful bright morning. On the road we met many Indians, and gave away much tobacco and shook hands a good deal. The old ladies are so animated; they shake both hands before you, talking all the time, and continue the motion with head and hands, when you give them tobacco, saying, or rather making a noise like, "tu-choo."

At Lytton we caught up the second coach; some of the passengers had felt the heat so much that it made them sick, but we did not mind it at all. D., the Colonel, and the Commodore stopped and bathed in the Thompson. We are returning the same way we came, and are enjoying the beautiful scenery in the fine weather. Having plenty of time to spare, and passing one of those fishing-stations I told you of, we scrambled down the bank to see the man at work. His implement was like a very long landing-net, and he stood on the most rickety little spring-board platform over the rushing stream, and put his net into the water, drawing it down stream as far as he could reach ; when he felt a fish in it, he let go a string, which allowed the net to run down the frame, and to shut up the fish in a regular bag. Our gentlemen tried to do it, but they nearly tumbled into the river, and could not manage it at all.

I again got on the box, and drove over the worst piece of the road—such awful turns, and such a precipice at the edge of the narrow road ! It certainly requires good driving, and the coachman has to work hard all the time. We reached our camp at six, and in an hour were at dinner and a splendid camp-fire.

Wednesday, 13th.—I got up at six to look out at a curious effect of fog. We are about 800 feet above the river. The morning was bright and lovely, all the mountains clear, and an extensive view lay before me ; but when I looked down at the Fraser, instead of its muddy stream I beheld a beautiful river of soft cloud ! This layer of fog must have been 200 or 300 feet thick, as we could tell by the trees on the banks, and it was the prettiest thing I ever saw in the way of mist.

We had a very successful journey back to Yale, and D. and I sat on the box for the last hour of the way. The driver and all the Yaleites were delighted that we had enjoyed the trip, and were not frightened ; and the coachman's testimony to my courage during the perilous drive to Kamloops was "that I hadn't a scare in me." We drove down to the steamer Royal City, and had the Oppenheims to dine with us.

Thursday, 14th.—The stern-wheel awoke us about 6 A. M. It gives the most odious motion to the steamer. About eleven we got to New Westminster, which D. thinks should be the terminus of the new Pacific Railway, and the Mayor came on board, and presented me with photographs of all the arches. The Commodore left us here, and we went on a little farther to join the Douglas, upon which steamer I have been scribbling this.

We had a very smooth passage of about twenty miles to Victoria, where we found it raining heavily. This only made our drawing-room, with its fire and lights, look more than ever comfortable after all our traveling; and then the delight of finding a mail waiting, and a nice quiet hour for reading our letters!

Friday, 15th.—Fred Ward, who is “housekeeper,” has ordered up the prisoners from the Penitentiary to “pluck chickens” for the ball; it is the custom here, and this morning, when we walked into the ball-room, we found six prisoners, with chains to their legs, and an armed man standing over them, polishing the floor.

D. was, as usual, shut up with some argumentative Victorian till 4.30 P. M., when I got him out for a little drive, and we walked home.

Saturday, 16th.—After lunch we went to a rifle-match. His Ex. gave away his medals, and we saw some “company” there. The Commodore joined us, and we walked home. In the evening we attended an amateur concert.

Monday, 18th.—Prisoners all busy, preparing for the ball. Fred brought the head gardener into the drawing-room to give him some directions about flowers, and was about to take him to the dining-room, when he said, “I can’t leave that man here; he’s a convict.” There was a storm last night, and the weather looks bad.

We visited the High School, received an address, and replied. D. presented some medals for competition, which were unexpected, and gave great pleasure. We then called upon the ex-Governor, Mr. Trutch, to see his mother, an old lady of seventy-seven, who is dying to come to the ball, but can not get her doctor’s permission to do so. I rested in the afternoon, and at seven we had a very merry little dinner in a small room. There was a rumor that the great Ah Sâm was drunk, and that the supper would be very bad; but the dinner was all right, so we felt some hope. The guests were invited at 8.30, and soon after nine D. and I came down to open the ball. The room is a very nice one, and we had had all the windows taken out, and a sort of corridor tent of canvas, lined with flags, put up the whole way round the outside, which added greatly to the available space. I must say I enjoyed the ball very much, and I think every one else did. We all danced from 9.30 till three without intermission, and as fathers, mothers, daughters, and sons are all equally dancing-mad here, and as we had a great number of naval officers, and were in ourselves an element of novelty to the Victorians, and they were new to us, there was a great deal of spirit in the ball. When every one else had gone, we had some more supper and a talk; the former was very good, and Ah Sâm had been maligned.

Tuesday, 19th.—We breakfasted at eleven, and had to start immediately after for the Esquimault Dockyard; the Commodore went on first, and received us there with the officials belonging to it. D. was to drive in the first pile of a new dry dock; and when this ceremony, which was performed by the aid of steam, was accomplished, we went over the stores, and then to lunch. The croquet-ground was covered in with sails and flags, and the tables were laid on it. Our health was drunk, and D.'s reply was very successful, containing a little chaff about the way in which he has been shut up every and all day with the male portion of the population of Victoria—which amused them immensely.

When all was over we went to see the Rocket—a gun-boat—and then drove home, the Commodore returning to the Amethyst.

Wednesday, 20th.—Such a day of labor! D. very busy from 7 A. M. preparing for a very important speech; at eleven the deputation came, and he spoke till 2.30; then lunch, and off to the Cathedral to attend the christening of a baby—"Frederick Temple Cornwall." Then on to a public picnic on Beacon Hill; there were numbers of people there, and we stayed an hour, and said good-by to all we knew. Fred and I then came on board the Amethyst, and D. went back to Government House to see that the speech was ready for the press. Some mistake had been made in reporting it, and he found it in such hopeless confusion that he did not get away till quite late, missing the dinner on board, and half the performance which was given for us. The officers had got up some songs and glees, and afterwards we had some Christy Minstrels, which were very amusing.

Thursday, 21st.—The morning was lovely, and D., having finished his business, was able to enjoy himself. The Commodore took me for a row, and he went on board the Douglas, where there was a party to see us off. We started at twelve, accompanied by the little steamer, and had much waving of handkerchiefs before parting with her.

I regret to say that I was not able to appear at dinner, and that, one by one, those who sat down disappeared from the table. We had a very rough night, and half the officers and sailors were ill.

The mail steamer Dakota started an hour after us, bent upon beating us.

Saturday, 23d.—Beautiful weather, and all decidedly better.

San Francisco: Sunday, 24th.—Anchored at 7 A. M., and have won the race against the Dakota. We stayed on board for church, and then said a temporary "good-by" to the ship and her officers, and came ashore to the hotel.

Monday, 25th.—At twelve o'clock we went on board the Amethyst again, the ward-room officers having asked us to lunch with them. They are all so civil and kind, and received us most hospitably; we are sorry to part. After our farewells were made to our hosts, we set off again, accompanied by the Commodore, on another little expedition. General McDowell met us, and we went by train with him southward for an hour; at the station we had a carriage-and-four, and drove to the house of a Mr. Mills. This was to show us a Californian home; and certainly, after passing through the sandy hills, it was refreshing to come upon a little oasis of brilliant green, and tropical plants. The house was as nice a show-house as I have seen: some good pictures, and bedrooms really liveable in, in spite of magnificent monograms in the center of each pillow-case. All the country round looks burned up, and yellow and sandy, while the place itself is fresh, green, gay with flower-beds, and dignified by very handsome evergreen oaks and enormous bay-trees. We had to hurry away from it, and get into our carriage, to drive to Mr. Sharon's.

It was too late for us to see the grounds, but I am now in a position to tell you something of a Californian merchant's home, and society.

The house was built by a certain Mr. Ralston, and on his death it became the property of his partner, Mr. Sharon, who was a miner, has twice been a millionaire, and twice has lost all, this being his third enjoyment of a great fortune. He owns a gigantic hotel, another almost as big in San Francisco, a large house in town, this country place, and a big house at Washington, not to mention various little mines and railways; and he is here considered as the merchant-prince of 'Frisco.

We were shown into the hall, which at first gave the impression of a small house, though opening into large corridors; it seems as though originally there were two sitting-rooms, and that a ball-room and supper-room, a place for the dancers to flirt in, and a corridor, had all been added.

Everything opens into everything, with sliding, muffled windows; and nothing is imposing. The ball-room is a good room and pretty, but the nicest feature of the house is a sort of sitting-room upstairs, on to which the bedrooms open. We were immediately taken there, and told not to dress for dinner (our servants had brought on our ball things); so we were soon down again, and were introduced to the company in the house. The guests are General Sherman, a very pleasing man, and Mr. Cameron* and his daughter, a ladylike and handsome girl. General McDowell does most of the honors, and he marshaled us in to dinner, I going with our host, Mr. Sharon, a very quiet little man. I told him I liked his hotel, and I tried to look as if $14,000,000,000—a sum he named—conveyed a definite idea to my mind. There was no plate, no ornament, no china on the table, no luxury whatever here. No table could have looked less wealthy, and the dinner itself was simple. I only saw part of it, however, for I was suddenly told to go and dress, and accordingly off we ladies went to prepare for the ball.

The ball guests were coming by train, and nothing was done until they did come, which was an hour and a half after I was ready, so Mr. Cameron gave me an arm, and walked me up and down the corridors, and sat me down occasionally, and took me up again and round again.

The train did at last arrive, and with it the company—ladies first. I observed a great latitude as to the style of dress worn. There were low dresses and square dresses, velvet, merino, morning silks, and regular ball-gowns; every one seemed to appear just as they pleased. There were girls who would have been pretty but for the paint and powder, which was laid on thick, and sprinkled over the hair just in sufficient quantities to spoil it. I asked some one afterwards whether she considered that paint was de rigueur here, as I saw it was so much used, and she told me it was used by girls to a great extent. I said, "Do they acknowledge that they paint?" She said, "Not paint; powder." There is no deception about it, however, for it is thick.

The dancing is different to ours—the square dances an improvement, I think—much more lively, and much delightful courtesying and bowing going on. I danced the opening quadrille, and was much amused; the band-master stood close to me, and called out the orders, "Ladies' chain, set to partners, cross," etc., in a loud voice. The waltzes are slow, and there is a particular way of holding your partner, which I don't admire. .

There was no tea-room; the only refreshments were for the gentlemen—a large bowl of punch, brandy, gin, and champagne; the table was in one of the recesses of the corridors, and the men sat and drank and smoked there. At twelve Mr. Sharon came, and told me it was time "for lunch," and I went with him into the dining-room, to the top of the table, where a small round one and a chair were placed for me; the others stood. The only ornamentations on the table were sugar ships.

Every one was most kind to us, and Mr. Sharon took us in his carriage to the train, in which we returned with the rest of the company to San Francisco. When we got into our carriage at the station we had a good laugh. It was a large sort of coach, but four was the number intended to be inside. We sat three on a seat: D., the Commodore, and I on one, and three people opposite to us, when, to our astonishment, an extra bench was put down between us, and two ladies came in and sat, one partly on His Ex.'s knee and partly on the bench; the other, after trying my lap, happily moved on to the Commodore's.

At Mr. Sharon's my maid met some Clandeboye and Bangor people; one maid-servant told her she should go home as soon as she could sell out her "Stocks" at 100. She had bought in at 18, and now they are 85.

Tuesday, 26th.—After breakfast Fred Ward and I went to church for the purpose of standing as godfather and godmother to Francis Ward's baby, who was born the day we reached 'Frisco.

When we met the baby in church her name was not chosen; but they wanted one to go with May, and when I suggested Muriel they were delighted; so Muriel May she was called. I held her the whole service, and as she was awake I had to nurse her, and to do the "goose-step," all the time.

Mr. Miller, navigating-lieutenant of the Amethyst, came to lunch with us, and brought the charts, in order that we might choose some anonymous places to which we might give names. You will be interested to hear that future maps will show the "Dufferin Range" and the "Countess of Dufferin Range" of mountains. "Dufferin Island," "Chatfield Island," "Hamilton Cape," "Littleton Cape," "Ward Cape"; and Mr. Miller is to be immortalized, too.

There are "no end" of mountains, and the ranges had no names before.

We asked our reporters to dine with us, and they, ourselves, and the Commodore had a most delightful evening. D. and I quite agree we would have come the whole journey for the sake of seeing the Chinese Theatre.

We went there with the necessary appendage of a policeman, and had a box next to that of Generals Sherman and McDowell. The theatre itself is quite unornamented, and is what some people might call dirty; but I am too much pleased to be critical. The pit was quite full of Chinamen, as was the gallery, with the exception of a small place set apart for women, where about fifty ladies sat. Our boxes were opposite to them. The stage ran right across the theatre, and was innocent of side-wings or scenery. There were two doors, with a curtain in front of each; the band sat between these doors, and the actors played in front of the musicians. The two ends of the stage seemed to be used as sitting-rooms for any one who chose to "walk up."

I don't know whether you are aware that a Chinese play is not an affair of hours, or of days, but of months, and that you can have about six hours a night of it as long as it lasts. We went for half an hour, and stayed two, and even then we left most reluctantly.

The music is of the bagpipe order, but not so loud, and D. was charmed with the minor key and the barbaric tunes. It went on almost the whole of the play, one musician at a time taking a smoke and a rest, while the actors performed.

When we arrived the stage was occupied by a company of aristocratic Chinamen, and it was evident that an important council was being held. The councilors were magnificently dressed in gold and embroidered satin and various-shaped head-dresses, and their manners were splendid. The acting we might consider stagey, but it seems to suit the dress and the people, and it was delightful to see them walk, or move their arms, and, above all, sit down—they did it with such an air! One gentleman wore two enormous drooping feathers in his hat, which he twirled just as if they were mustaches.

There was a discussion, partly sung, between the dignitaries, and I "guess" that there was rebellion going on, for when they rose the party divided and went out at separate doors, returning again with soldiers under their respective leaders.

A fight then took place, with a pirouette between each blow. The soldiers were plainly dressed (black Chinese tunics with sashes), but their chests were bare, and in the second part of the performance one gentleman showed so much of his manly bosom that I really thought that, in his ardor, he would get out of his sleeves.

After these political scenes the drama became more domestic, and a lady (a man dressed as such) came on. She had the most modest of manners, and a great affectation of refinement; she begged her husband not to join the war, but, in spite of her prayer and that of his mother-in-law, he went, and then the story began to resemble that of "Faust."

Having torn ourselves away from the theatre, we went to the café opposite, which had lanterns hung outside. We found music and gambling going on upstairs, and a few women and men about, who instantly offered us chairs, and began to speak English to us. They asked if we would have tea, and as we "would," they took us into an adjoining room, laid a table, and all collected round us talking. The tea was delicious, drunk without cream or sugar (the latter they greatly object to), and we had also ginger and sweetmeats. The women came behind me, and touched my things, and were especially interested in the jet on my cloak. We saw opium-pipes and water-pipes, and looked at the women's nails; and the men laughed and said, in allusion to their length, "They lazy, never do anything." We offered to pay, but "No, no, we treat you"; so we effected an exchange of cards, and are to have and give photographs. D. shook hands with a lady, who instantly hid her face and fled.

Our guide next took us to see the "Joss House," or Chinese church. We passed through a dark passage, and mounted a winding stair outside a house, till we reached the top story, where we found the place of worship. We saw it by the light of two candles and three night-lights burning in front of idols. It is not at all imposing, being small, and crowded with things; no seats, and very little standing-room. The "altar" stretches across the building, and is occupied by three miserable gods in separate divisions; a few gimeracks are placed near them—offerings from their worshipers. The only thing at all handsome is a beautiful piece of carved wood, gilt, which evidently portrays an allegorical subject, and which stretches in front of the entrance-door, and partially screens the idols.

This ended our last day at San Francisco, and tomorrow the return journey begins.

We said good-by to the Commodore (Captain Chatfield, R. N.), who has been very kind to us on board his ship, and a very pleasant addition to our society ashore.

You will see that I was not bewildered with the magnificence of San Francisco, and was surprised when Mr. Cameron, a Cabinet Minister (but a man who has not been to Europe), told me that when he was asked "what he thought of San Francisco," he replied, "I think nothing; I am simply dazed." Of course the town is wonderful, because it is built on impossible sand-hills. Chicago is to me much more splendid and magnificent; but in reply to this opinion I am told, "Oh! but then, so far West!"

Wednesday, 27th.—We had to leave the hotel at San Francisco early, and to cross in a ferry to the railway-station, where we found our Pullman ready for us!

The day was very warm and dusty, and the grizzly bear at Colfax looked intensely miserable with the heat. He received grapes thankfully.. Enormous bunches here are to be had for five cents.

Thursday, 28th.—On the Alkali Plains ; weather pleasant, but the acrid dust disagreeable to the eyes.

Friday, 29th.—We breakfasted at Ogden, and said good-by to Fred Ward there, he being the first deserter from our party. Then we started for Salt Lake City. The journey of two hours is a very pretty one. Salt Lake was in sight almost the whole way, and was of a deep, bright blue ; while on the other side of the carriage the hills were red and orange and brilliant yellow, autumn having already put the sumach plant into her gorgeous livery. We had arranged to dine at the hotel, and to sleep in the railway-car ; but I may tell you at once that the mosquitoes took possession of it early in the evening, and that we accepted our defeat, and spent the night at the Gentile Hotel, which is the very best for food I have been in on this continent.

The city is certainly a wonderful creation. The streets are very broad, so that the tramway which runs down the middle of each one does not interfere with one's carriage-wheels. At the side runs a little open stream of rapid-flowing, clear water—a most refreshing sight in a naturally very dusty place. Green trees grow along the banks of this artificial ditch, and the watering of the arid plain is the greatest work the Prophet has performed.

As we drove from the station to the Walker House, we passed a pretty villa, with a garden and lawn and fountain in front ; and this afterwards proved to be the house of our friend—that is to say, the gentleman to whom we had brought a letter of introduction. D. and I went there later, and found a good farmer kind of man living in this fine house. A wife, a daughter, a friend, and a son came into the room, and I became very impatient when I found that nothing but European wars and trifles of that kind were to be talked of; we could not even make out whether our host was a Mormon or not! At last I managed to suggest to D. that we "really must be going," and then our host asked if we wished to see the Tabernacle, and if we wished an interview with Brigham Young; this last honor we declined. D. declares that it made me quite irritable even to be in his vicinity, and I think it did.

Our friend drove, and a nephew of his wife's went with us to fetch Fred and the Colonel, and when some bright particular Mormon star passed the carriage stopped, and D. was introduced. The gentlemen jumped out for these presentations, and it was when left alone for these few seconds that I picked up some scraps of information. Her Ex., in a violent hurry, to young man: "Hem—, is Mr. J. a—gentile?" Young man, smiling: "No, but I am." Second opportunity: "Has Mr. J. more than one wife?" "No; she is my aunt." This may be called an evasion, for I find that he had two, and has eighteen children; but the second lady died, and the daughter we saw was her child.

I was introduced to a few people too, and met George Q. Cannon, an M. C., a polygamist, an apostle (he is building a very fine house for some favored lady); and Olson Pratt, the man who led the Mormons to the Promised Land, and who is one of the cleverest of the apostles.

The first thing to be seen was the Tabernacle, in front of which a temple of granite is being built. The service will be held there when the congregation is small; but it seems to be intended principally for church offices of different kinds, and I suppose they will have a new Endowment House in it, for the place in which the marriages are now performed is a miserable little building.

The Tabernacle is a huge and hideous edifice with a great flat dome. There is no support to the arch inside, of which fact the Mormons are proud. It holds 12,000 people, and we found it decorated with garlands and hanging bunches of flowers. There is an enormous organ, which we heard played; and from Brigham Young's pulpit you can see every seat in the vast circular room. The acoustic properties are perfect.

We next visited "Zion's" co-operative store, a very large place; indeed, the shops of the town appear to me to be remarkably good. Amelia (Brigham's most powerful wife) was in the shop, but unfortunately we did not know it at the time, and, being with Mormons, we were not told any gossip. Our driver took us past the Amelia Palace, a fine house which Brigham is now building for the favorite. Opposite to it is the Lion House, where she and other ladies now reside, and the Beehive, also the abode of the Mrs. Youngs.

A wall is built in front of this harem, so it is only when the various gates are open that a peep in is to be had. The only real evidence of polygamy to be seen by the stranger is the multiplication of doors to a gentleman's house; the Mormons are certainly shy of the subject with "gentiles," and only say, "That is Mr. Cannon's house"; "that is another house of Mr. Cannon's."

We visited the Theatre and the Town-Hall, and then returned to dine at our hotel. I believe our one friend here is a "wet" Mormon, and at his house, where we spent the evening, we only met one-wifed men. The Governor of the State and his wife went with us, and on arriving there we found every one sitting in a circle close round the walls of the room. We took our places in this very stiff row, and I kept mine all the time. D.

managed to lift his chair and to change his position a little. There were some officers of the U. S. Army, and some of our host's two families, also a Mr. H., whose daughter has just married one of the sons; the parents, when they found their children had been to the Endowment House, showed their want of faith by carrying them off to a registry office, and insisting upon their going through a legal marriage. Miss H. has only one father, but she had four grandfathers. 'We had Mormon fruit, Mormon cake, and champagne, handed round by a Mormon daughter of the house.

Our hostess was quiet and rather melancholy-looking—the shadow of a possible colleague over her; she has not been out of the town for twenty-two years, though her daughters have been to Europe, and go to New York; I suppose Mormon husbands think, "where ignorance is bliss," etc.

Saturday, 30th.—We had to leave very early in the morning, and were, as our hotel-keeper playfully remarked, "sent off with fireworks," the illumination being the burning of a rival inn. The whole roof was on fire, and the goods were being thrown out of the window.

We breakfasted at Ogden, and then, in our comfortable "house-upon-wheels," began to ascend the Rocky Mountains.

Sunday, October 1st.—It was difficult to believe that this was Sunday, for when we arrived at Cheyenne all was bustle at the railway-station, and in the town the shops were open. The only "Sabbath" look was given to the place by the laziness of the men, who sat about and drank beer. The "West" seems to me to be very careless in religious matters, and the only church we could discover in this town was a Roman Catholic one. We and our two cars were left here.

Monday, 2d.—We slept “on board,” and started at five in the morning. About nine we reached Denver, where, unfortunately, we had arranged to sleep before we knew of the quiet night at Cheyenne. It is an uninteresting town, surrounded by mountains. It has some good shops, and is planted all over with fresh little green poplars; but we found twenty-four hours too much to spend in it.

In spite of its uninteresting character, it has its own little political excitements, and a torch-light procession of Democrats marched past our hotel this evening; while a Republican one formed close by, and set off in the opposite direction. It is wonderful how these rival processions are managed without collision.

A curious man with long hair sat by us at meals, who turns out to be a great hunter; he offers to take D. and me across the Rocky Mountains.

One falls into very bad manners at these hotels. The dinner is before one in little dishes, and one dips a fork into each dish, and takes bits of this and of that in the same plate, and uses one’s knife promiscuously for salt, butter, and the whole dinner. The cloth is generally somewhat dirty, and there is a clatter going on in the room that is bewildering. The service is excessively slow, and it is useless to try and get anything from any waiter but your own. At Cheyenne we had a most sympathetic black, who said, with the utmost feeling, that “he was so sorry” when we expressed an inability to eat any more; we almost over-ate ourselves to oblige him.

I saw numbers of negro men and women on horse-back to-day, and there was a white lady riding about in a pea-green habit.

We heard of a young man who came down from the mines a week before with 1,900 lbs. weight of gold, worth about 16s. an ounce. He had an escort of twenty men, to each of whom he paid \$200 ($\text{£}40$). We were shown a nugget weighing about 145 ounces.

Tuesday, 3d.—We were very glad to leave Denver this morning. D. had a talk with the hunter, who is known as Oregon Bill. He gave us his photograph, in which he is depicted with an Indian scalp hanging from his belt.

We traveled through the ugliest country it is possible to conceive: a flat plain, without the smallest variation in it the whole day. Our only excitement was seeing a calf dragged along by a lasso, and numerous prairie-fires at night, illuminating the landscape in every direction.

Wednesday, 4th.—The country still ugly, though when we got to the Missouri a few trees and some castor-oil plants were to be seen. I think we found this almost the longest day of our tour.

Thursday, 5th.—Arrived at St. Louis early, and found that it is the day of the year to be here—the best day of the Great Fair. The town and hotels are crammed, and some residents good-naturedly turned out to give us their rooms. We found two mails awaiting us, and after reading them went off to see the show.

There is a very fine, uncovered amphitheatre, where we saw trotting-horses and four-in-hands; a band played, and the seats all round the course were filled; there must have been 30,000 people there, and crowds outside and all through the grounds. It is a great holiday here.

D. took me a walk through the town, which is one of the nicest I have seen in the States—solid-looking, and with very handsome residences. The hotel is very good and comfortable.

Friday, 6th.—We left St. Louis early, and stood outside our train to examine the great bridge over which we had to pass. It crosses the Mississippi and the Missouri, the two having joined into one muddy river. The bridge is built on three piers, and is, I believe, a wonderful piece of engineering work. The carriage-way is over the bridge, the railway through it. The whole looks very light and airy, and suggestive of a “smash”; but it is, of course, really very strong.

We read our newspapers, and I went for the third time through all my letters! Letters are never more appreciated or spelled through than when one is traveling.

Saturday, 7th.—Soon after breakfast we crossed the St. Clair in our train, on a large boat built for the purpose, and being now in Canada the “Grand Tour” ends.

D. and I spend Sunday at Toronto; on Monday morning I go to Montreal, and he to Philadelphia. Friday, I hope to see my children, and am planning holidays and “great larks.”

CHAPTER XVII.

OUR FIFTH WINTER AND SUMMER IN CANADA.

Friday, 13th October.—The “Grand Tour” being over, I quite forgot I had still to keep up a journal, and, suddenly remembering it, I find myself at the end of a week with no notes, and the necessity of remembering how I have spent the time. We arrived at Toronto last Saturday night, and were very hospitably received by the Macdonalds at Government House. I liked them all very much.

On Sunday D. and I went to church in the Cathedral, and in the afternoon a few people came to see us—Lady Macdonald, old Mr. Chapman, etc. The Howlands, Mowats, Colonel Cumberland, and Mr. Crooks dined.

On Monday morning I had to be up at 5.30, to catch my train to Montreal, and D., whom I left behind, started at eleven en route for Philadelphia. In spite of our recent long tour, Alexander and I both thought this the longest journey we ever made. We got to Montreal at 9.30, Mr. Mackenzie having been with me as far as Prescott. Russell met me at the train, and I found Gwen in her own house, looking very well, and all her surroundings so pretty and comfortable. Gwen and I spend quiet mornings together. One afternoon we went a lovely drive up the mountain. We visited her chief friends, having tea with Miss de Rocheblave* and

* A French-Canadian lady who has very many friends in England.

Mrs. Stephens,* and driving with Miss Allen to the Races.

We breakfasted early this morning, and I left by the train for Ottawa.

Friday, 20th.—Two days of Indian summer; such lovely weather. We drove in the afternoons, and remained in the garden till five. The Council and Ministers are making arrangements to give D. a grand reception on his return; we expect him on Monday or Tuesday.

Tuesday, 24th.—Sunday was wet and gloomy again, and so was Monday, on which day D. returned. Four aldermen went to meet him at a station thirty miles off, and when he arrived at Ottawa there was a platform, a guard of honor, an address, and a carriage and four to bring him to the Government House. The children were very happy listening to the guns and watching for the four grays, and we all stood at the door to receive the Governor-General.

He was so surprised at the sight of his baby, who is much grown and improved, and admired Victoria, whom later in the evening Nelly dressed up in the most artistic manner as the “Queen of Sheba.”

Wednesday, November 1st.—The Count de Turenne arrived this morning to pay us a visit. He returns to France next month.

At three o’clock we went into town—a large party; seven children, accompanied by three parents, a nurse, and the Count—to see Tom Thumb. We filled two boxes, and the delight of the children made it very amusing. Basil jumped up and down, pounded the cushions, shouted “hurrah,” and roared with laughter; and they all clapped and cheered in company with the rest of the spectators, who were mostly children. The dwarfs did some little plays, one having a man in the part of a "mischievous monkey" in it, who once made a dash at our box, and was received with shrieks.

The Littletons dined with us, and the Count told us funny stories about his tour. The weather is very bad—almost pitch-dark, and wet.

Sunday, 5th.—We were surprised when we got to church to have the sermon first; it was explained in the evening that this was a hint to people who came late; and it was rather unfortunate that on this day it happened that the Governor-General was two or three minutes late, and of course he could not imagine what had happened when he found us in the middle of the sermon.

Tuesday, 19th December.—The children did their Christmas shopping. I think it is the event of the year they like the best, and they each go with a few shillings, and with a list of about sixteen people, for whom they expect to buy handsome presents.

Christmas Day, 1876.—The children's voices are heard very early, rejoicing over presents they have received from their nurses.

The whole family, except the absent Archie, dined at our lunch, Baby and Victoria for the first time. The Littletons came to tea, and there was a round table with ten very happy faces at it. Then came the tree, which looked very brilliant, and gave universal satisfaction. Every one seems to have got just what they wanted, and the clamor of musical instruments resounding through the house ever since sounds cheerful, if not pretty. When the pleasures of the tree were exhausted we had snapdragon, and then a "Yorkshire wassail-bowl," in which we all drank Archie's health with cheers.

Sunday, 31st.—Gwen's baby was christened to-day.

Monday, January 1, 1877.—A hard day. At ten the children rehearsed their play; at twelve His Ex., the A. D. C.'s, and I, having dressed ourselves smart, sat for two hours receiving all the men in Ottawa.

Exhausted by two, we lunched, and I then packed off my family to bed, promising faithfully to call them at four.

At three a servants' children's party commenced, and mine joined them for tea; after which they acted a little play with great success.

Friday, 5th.—I had my annual children's party to-day. Seventy-eight of them came at five, and mothers besides. After the play, which was acted again, there was tea: two long tables down the dining-room, and one outside for the grown-ups. The magic lantern came next, and then we cleared away the chairs, and the children danced about, and amused themselves very much.

Saturday, 6th.—We had a skating-party, and final representation of the children's play, "Fifine, the Fisher Maid," which went off extremely well. They like the appreciativeness of a grown-up audience.

Victoria was very funny: she would run on to the stage and exhibit her shoes, bracelets, etc., to the spectators; at last I had to draw her back, as she was taking the interest off from the real performers. When the curtain was drawn up again at the end, she came forward and made a very nice little courtesy, and said, "Good-night, everybody."

There was a scene in the play in which all go down to the bottom of the sea. I managed this by having green tarlatan, upon which fishes were pasted, drawn up slowly in front of the children to a certain height above their heads, showing the depth of the water.

Toronto: Wednesday, 10th.—We left Ottawa for Toronto yesterday, on the most lovely Canadian morning, to stay with the Macdonalds. After lunch to-day we set off for the Town-Hall, and had an address from the Mayor and a reply from His Ex. This was the one about which one of the aldermen said, when discussing the question of our reception, and the expense of it, that "a nice little speech from the Governor-General would cost nothing."

People were presented to us after it, and then we went to tea at the Macphersons'. There was a very pleasant dinner of thirty people here in the evening.

Thursday, 11th.—D. and I went to the Mechanics' Institute to receive an address. A ball given in the evening was very nicely managed, and handsomely done. We received the guests with Mr. and Miss Macdonald, and then walked through the room to the daïs prepared for us. I sat there most of the evening talking to different people, and His Ex. danced everything till early next morning.

Friday, 12th.—After breakfast D. and I visited the rooms of the Art Union Society of Toronto, and in the afternoon we went to the Curling and Skating Rink, where an address was read, to which he replied in very happy terms. They presented him with curling stones and brooms, and me with a beautiful pair of skates.

I skated a little, and D. curled. He had a dinner at the National Club, and made a very amusing speech. Alluding to his duties as a constitutional governor, he likened himself to "the humble functionary we see superintending the working of some complicated mass of chain-driven machinery. This personage merely walks about with a little tin vessel of oil in his hand, and he pours in a drop here and a drop there, as occasion or the creaking of a joint may require; while his utmost vigilance is directed to no higher aim than the preservation of his wheels and cogs from the intrusion of dust, grits, or other foreign bodies." The "Grits" being the party now in power, this joke on their name was much appreciated.

The weather was very cold; there is so much wind we feel it more than at Ottawa.

Sunday, 14th.—Before church we visited the Sunday-school, and then had a very long service in the Cathedral. After it we drove out to see Mr. and Mrs. Gzowski in their pretty house; then lunch here; and after it Fred and I drove out with Mr. W. Howland to the General Hospital. It is a very fine one, and we went all over it, and on to tea with Mrs. Howland.

Monday, 15th.—We four ladies—Miss Macdonald, her sisters, and myself—dined alone, the gentlemen being at the Club dinner given to His Ex., where he made another important speech.

Tuesday, 16th.—Such a lovely day at last. In the afternoon there was a very pleasant little skating-party at Government House, and in the evening we went to see "Arrah na Pogue" at the Theatre. When the play was over we drove back, changed our dresses, and went off to the railway-car, where we meant to sleep. We remained in the station all night, but there was such a noise that we could not sleep, and in the morning we started for Ottawa.

Thursday, February 8th.—In the afternoon I attended the opening of Parliament. The Senate Chamber was crowded, and all the dresses, etc., looked very handsome. The Speech was a rather long one.

In the evening we had a very large Drawing-room in the Senate Chamber. There must have been 800 presentations, and the room got quite crammed.

Thursday, 15th.—We had an evening rehearsal of some plays we are getting up, and all the actors came to dine first. Of course there were several things to be improved : the gas did not go out when it should, etc.; but by working hard we got it all right.

Friday, 16th.—We had the dress-rehearsal. Both pieces were immensely successful. D. was delighted; the dresses capital, and in “Our Wife” very pretty.

The “Loan of a Lover” came first, Mr. Kimber and his sister doing the principal parts, and doing them admirably. Colonel Littleton and I, Mr. Brodie and Mr. McLean, did the smaller parts. The songs were all well sung, and we put in a few additional ones. The two Freds looked very magnificent in “Our Wife.” Fred Ward acted extremely well; his part is most amusing, and suited him exactly. Mr. Kimber was at his very best; indeed, we had a very strong cast for the whole play.

Saturday, 17th.—A rehearsal of “The Scrap of Paper” after lunch, and then a skating-party. There was no snow on the top of the slide, and consequently no tobogganing; and it was too cold for much skating, so we began to dance early.

Wednesday, 21st.—The day of our theatricals. The weather is beautifull, almost too warm. Great misfortunes happened to-day. Miss Lea,* who is staying with us to do a picture of me, took hartshorn by mistake, and nearly choked herself. Then D. got a bad headache; and at seven we had no gas at all! I was in despair. The order was given to collect all the candles and lamps in the house, and our cook, who was preparing a supper for 400, was left in sudden darkness. His wife was furious, and of course a couple of lamps had to be returned to him. You may imagine my feelings: all the passages and dressing-rooms in a miserable light; for by eight o’clock only a glimmer of gas had appeared. The stage was lighted up with candles, which dripped over us, and had to be replaced between each scene. It was so depressing.

People declared they were delighted; and certainly they did not mind the want of gas half as much as I did. At the end I felt much more tired than usual, owing to the worry.

Wednesday, March 7th.—I have forgotten to say that on Friday, the 2d, there was a great curling-match between our Club and Belleville for a medal; it was very exciting, the V. C. R. being behindhand at first; but we finally won by two points. We have to play once more before we can keep the medal.

Saturday, 10th.—Such a magnificent day. The trees sparkle like diamonds, and every twig and branch is entirely cased in ice. Against a bright blue sky they are too lovely. A large Parliamentary dinner in the evening.

Wednesday, 14th.—D. went into town, and after he got out of the sleigh he slipped upon the icy pavement, and fell very heavily on a step. Some men picked him up, and put him on his feet; but he could not stand, and fell again. They then carried him into a shop, where he lay on the floor for quite twenty minutes before he could recover his breath at all. Two doctors came, and bandaged him up tight. They said no bones were broken; but he was very severely bruised and shaken, and in the evening suffered great pain if he moved.

Of course he had to go to bed, and he missed the “Scrap of Paper”; it went off very well, and people were delighted with it. They were so interested in the story, and they thought every one very good in their parts. There were no hitches at all; the only drawback was D.’s absence.

Friday, 16th.—D. very poorly all day, and quite unable to move. Colonel * and Mrs. Hewitt came for the large military dinner which we gave. There were fifty-four at dinner, and the room looked very well. D. so disappointed to miss it.

Wednesday, 21st.—About 11 P. M. Mr. Brodie drove up to say that he, General Smyth, his son, etc., had been burned out, and had lost everything—two theatrical suits for Saturday into the bargain!

Saturday, 24th.—We had the last performance of the “Scrap of Paper.” D. was able to be at it, and in the house we had the Stephensons and Hewitts. There was a very large audience, and the piece was a great success. Between the acts we had some very good singing and playing.

Monday, April 30th.—D. and I were the recipients of a great honor to-day. The cabmen of Ottawa, having benefited by the gayeties at Government House this winter, got up a testimonial and an address for us, which they presented themselves.

They came at two o'clock—fourteen very respectable-looking men. They read an illuminated address, and then presented D. with a handsome stick with a gold top and inscription, and me with a silver card-case, on which is inscribed: “Presented to Her Excellency the Countess of Dufferin by the Hackmen of the City of Ottawa, as a token of esteem. April, 1877.”

When the presentation was over, D. showed them the house—our sitting-rooms, etc.—and gave them dinner in the ball-room. Directly the wine was poured out they all stood up and drank the Queen's health.

* Colonel Hewitt, R. E., at this time was Commandant of the Military College at Kingston, Ontario.

Philadelphia, and I to pay a visit (with Fred) to Gwen at Montreal. We had Mr. Reynolds's car, and parted with D. at Prescott. We had four hours to wait, but passed the time very pleasantly, walking and sitting by the riverside.

Saturday, 19th.—After a very delightful week with Gwen, Fred and I returned to Ottawa to-day, and the baby came down to see us off, as merry and amiable as usual.

Monday, 21st.—In the evening Fred, the Littletons, and I walked to the Reynoldses', and sat out on the steps at their house, watching the procession on the water in honor of the new Pope (Leo XIII). There were a quantity of canoes with torches, which were very pretty, and the Roman Catholic houses in town were illuminated. The night was fine, and we enjoyed the walk and the fine view from Ernscliffe (the Reynoldses' house).

Tuesday, 22d.—D. arrived from New York at 1.30 and we spent the afternoon out of doors.

Saturday, June 2d.—Mr. Ford* came to stay till Monday.

Thursday, 7th.—Before lunch an assembly of ecclesiastics arrived: "His Excellency the Apostolic Delegate to Canada," the Bishops of Ottawa, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward Island, with all their acolytes.

The first-named is Bishop Conroy, of Ardagh, and is sent here by the Pope to arrange various matters in this country. He is a very pleasant man, and after "doing" a quantity of institutions, he came with all the others to dine here, and he and his chaplain remained the night.

We dined in the ball-room, and were about fifty-five people—Ministers, Priests, Supreme Court Judges, etc.

* The present Ambassador at Madrid, Sir Francis Clare Ford, G. C. B.

The Delegate has been fêted and worked so much in Canada, that he seems to be longing for privacy and rest.

Friday, 8th.—The Bishop was off at 7.30 to have Mass in town; he returns to lunch, goes back to hold a levée, and then dines here.

Tuesday, 9th.—All the last week we have had most delightful weather, and not a mosquito to destroy our pleasure.

We left Ottawa to-day and had to be up early, and to breakfast soon after seven. The children were all dressed in time to see us off. Our traveling-party consists of Nellie, Fred, ourselves; Mr. Johnston, who comes as far as Montreal; and Colonel Stuart, whom we take with us in the Druid for a few days. We reached Prescott at ten, and then got on board the river-boat and spent a very pleasant day, the weather being delightful.

The Druid as nice and comfortable as usual. Nellie sleeps in the cabin next to us, and originally intended for my maid. Fred and Colonel Stuart have the two cabins in the forepart of the vessel.

Wednesday, 20th.—We got to Quebec directly after lunch, and as soon as D. had dismissed the guard of honor we went to the Citadel, and returned to dine on board the Druid. Dinner being over, we again started on our journey.

Gaspé: Saturday, 23d.—A fine but cold and windy day. D. and Fred went off for a little fishing, and brought back two salmon and three trout. D. was the lucky one. The men say we are a week late (always the case with salmon-fishing!); so we shall have to go up and live in the bush, instead of in our comfortable ship.

Monday, 25th.—Mr. Reynolds, Mr. Middleton, and the Molsons came to see me in the afternoon, and after dinner D. and I went over to their yacht. They expect to sail in the morning, and are leaving the fishing in disgust. Mr. Reynolds has only caught five fish, and Mr. Middleton nine.

The only lucky person has been Colonel McNeill; he got thirty-three salmon in the York, and last night there came a letter from him to say that he had just reached the Metapediac, and in one evening's fishing caught four salmon, averaging $29\frac{1}{2}$ lbs. in weight.

Tuesday, 26th.—D. and Fred have gone up to the house, so we shall not see them till we get to them tomorrow. Colonel Stuart is fishing down here, and will dine on board.

Wednesday, 27th.—All the morning preparations for our departure were being made, and at two o'clock we got off. We drove in a buggy for two hours, and then got on to horses. We only go at a foot's pace, but Nellie enjoyed it.

We arrived at five o'clock at the camp and found the river very low, but the water beautifully clear. We had a good account of the fishing. Tuesday afternoon D. caught six salmon and Fred four, and yesterday D. caught four and Fred six; besides, they have several trout. Nellie and I welcomed them home about eight o'clock, and saw the fish displayed on the rocks; then we dined, and sat at the camp-fire till bedtime. Nellie amused herself making "smudges," and filling saucers with moss and violets.

The flies are not so bad as usual this year.

Saturday, 30th.—D.'s morning's fishing produced three salmon, and Fred came home with two, and thirteen beautiful trout. After lunch we again went out in the canoe. At one moment I was to be seen standing on a small rock in the middle of the river, Nellie upon another, and D. on a chair, which we had brought with us and planted in the stream. We were all lashing the water, but were most unfortunate, and only brought home one trout between us.

Tuesday, 3d July.—I went out with D., and while fishing for trout had quite an adventure with one. I hooked him at the same time that D. had on a salmon. I was standing on a small rock in the middle of the river, and had neither landing-net nor salmon-killer with me, as D.'s man was to bring the net to me when I wanted it. The salmon, however, wished to go down the rapid, so D., his men, and his canoe, had to pass under my rod, and between me and my trout. When I had tired the fish out, the difficulty was to capture him; but I managed to get him on my rock, and to unhook him; and I had another on before D. came back.

He had arranged to go far up the river and sleep, so he started off at eleven o'clock, and after lunch Nellie and I went out with Fred. As the salmon would not rise, we both fished for trout, and had great fun. To our surprise, on returning home we found D.; no fish had arrived so far up the river, so of course he did not stay, and we arranged to go "out" to-morrow.

Wednesday, 4th.—All busy packing. D. stayed at home, and I went out for an hour, and caught ten trout —one $3\frac{1}{2}$ lbs., and the others smaller. I fish with a beautiful little bamboo rod which with the reel only weighs six ounces.

It was a lovely day; I was quite sorry to leave our camp, as I enjoyed it very much this year, and we were less troubled with flies than usual. We had the Captain to dine with us, and started immediately after dinner.

Thursday, 5th.—A beautiful day, and a lovely sunset and double rainbow. "A rainbow at night is a sailor's delight," so we hope it will be very fine to-morrow, when we ought to reach Tadousac.

Friday, 6th.—Arrived about eight in the morning; a most beautiful day, the children all well, and enjoying the seaside very much. We sat out on the balcony, and walked on the rocks.

Sunday, 15th.—We have spent a very pleasant ten days. The weather has been lovely, and we have sat out the most of the day. We were able to bathe occasionally, although the water is always very cold here—quite icy.

D. drew a good deal, and had finished some very nice sketches, which yesterday met with a sad mishap. We went on a fishing expedition up the Saguenay, taking the Gillespies with us in the Druid. We breakfasted on board, and then had a very pleasant voyage of two hours to the fishing-grounds. When we got back, D. found he had left all his sketching things and finished drawings below high-water mark at the fishing-place. He sent a man in a canoe to look for them, who found them, soaked and spoiled.

We are now returning to Ottawa to prepare for a tour in Manitoba, to which we are all looking forward with great pleasure.

CHAPTER XVIII.

THE NORTHWEST.

Monday, July 30th.—We left Ottawa this morning in good spirits and in smartish clothes, which we put on for the guard of honor and the friends who come to see us start. Once really off, we arrayed ourselves in cooler and more suitable traveling garments.

The day was not so hot as we expected, and when bed-time came we all acknowledged that the time had flown.

The maids, who are traveling more luxuriously than any ladies on board, grumble at having to sleep in the ordinary Pullman. Nellie and I have a cabin together.

Tuesday, 31st.—The train behaved in an extraordinary manner during the night. It rushed along at a furious pace for a couple of miles, pulled up with a frightful bump, stopped to shriek, went on again after three or four jerks, and in this way kept us thoroughly awake for what appeared the whole night, but was, I suppose, less than half of it. I felt a little the worse for the night's shaking, but a good breakfast in our own car and an hour spent outside of it in the fresh morning air quite revived me.

We had such a dusty day: five minutes sufficed to cover tables, sofas, our faces, hands and hair with the dirtiest powder; and it was quite useless to wash, for we became as bad as ever immediately after. We were so glad when we arrived at Lake Michigan, and felt the cool breeze from over its surface, and saw hundreds of people bathing in the refreshing water. At Chicago we got into carriages, and drove rapidly to the luxurious Palmer House, where we dined, and enjoyed the quiet and the cleanliness, after the jolting and the noise and the dust of the railway. We had an hour at the hotel, and returned to our Pullman much the better for our outing.

Wednesday, August 1st.—We had rather a pleasant day in the train, passing through a good deal of “bush” and half-settled country, and as we got near to St. Paul we crossed a very pretty lake, and then came in sight of the Mississippi, on which the town is built.

At the station a dozen gentlemen came on board, and took us to the hotel in carriages; and we enjoyed a night “on shore” very much indeed.

Thursday, 2d.—We breakfasted at 8.30, and almost directly after held a little reception. A great number of gentlemen were presented to us, and then one made a speech, to which D. replied. They told me afterwards they were “more than delighted” with his “remarks.”

This affair was scarcely over when I was hurried off to make a tour of the country. In the first carriage D. and I, General Johnston, and Mr. Rice went. They were both pleasant men, citizens of this town; the latter had been for many years in Congress, and was a person to whom every one appealed for every sort of information.

The second carriage contained General Terry and the Littletons. General Terry is the officer who was in command when General Custer attacked the Indians, and lost his life. Four more carriages followed, with Nellie, the A. D. C.’s, and more gentlemen.

We drove to Minneapolis, through a flat country, sometimes bush, sometimes prairie, and sometimes beautiful cornfields. Minneapolis is younger than St. Paul, the latter being about thirty years of age; it is, I think, more flourishing-looking, and the residences in the town, each surrounded with lawns and flower-gardens, look charming and comfortable. The hotel where we lunched is a very fine one.

We soon set off again, and went to see the St. Anthony Falls. They consist of a series of rapids and an artificial "slide"; the water was wearing away the rock, and the hand of man has intervened to keep it in check, and to prevent the lumber interests being injured by Nature. Then we went over a flour-mill, the flour here being a great spécialité. This mill turns out a thousand barrels a day, some of a peculiar, very white quality, which makes the most delicious bread; it contains the most nutritious parts of the wheat, and is made by a newly-invented process; but I will not attempt to describe this, any more than I have the engineering works on the river.

Into our carriages again, and off to see the Minnehaha Falls. "From the waterfall, he called her 'Minnehaha'—'Laughing Water.'" The season has been very dry, and there was very little water coming over the Fall; but I am very glad to have seen it, as Longfellow's poem is one of my earliest recollections. When we returned to our carriages we changed company a little. General Terry came with us, and we went with him to the Fort

It is beautifully situated on a very high cliff at the junction of the Mississippi and the Minnesota. As we drove into the court formed by the barracks, we were saluted by soldiers, and found the troops and the band arranged (what an unmilitary expression!) on the grass, looking so gay with their uniforms and colors. The band played, and we walked about, and then the officer in command took us into his house, where we were introduced to his sister and to another lady, and through the house on to the top of a tower, at the corner of the fortification, looking over the rivers. It was covered overhead, and there was a balustrade round it, ornamented with flags. Such a pretty place! We enjoyed sitting out in the cool, refreshing air, and looking at the lovely view.

When we left we crossed the Mississippi in a sort of ferry-boat, which was made to go backwards and forwards by the current of the river itself; the flat-boat was pulled in a slanting direction, so that the stream acted upon it, just as the wind does upon a sail, and moved it across.

We reached St. Paul about eight o'clock, said good-by to our very kind entertainers, and were introduced to Mr. Rice's daughters, who appeared to be very nice girls—the only ladies we have had an opportunity of seeing here. Nellie came home in tremendous spirits. In her carriage there was a doctor, who had laid himself out to amuse her, and whom she thinks very "witty" and delightful. At the Fort she was much interested at hearing there was an officer with a wooden leg; so when one came up to speak to her, she looked at him, and having decided that he at any rate was all right, she asked him to show her the gentleman with the wooden leg. He replied that he was the one, and in her confusion she could only think of asking him if it hurt still.

After supper we were serenaded by a band, and an attempt was made to induce D. to speak to the crowd; but he declined. Every one has been so kind and civil to us here; we have enjoyed our day very much.

Friday, 3d.—We left the hotel early in the morning, and once more got into our train. We journeyed on all day, through swamps, lakes, and prairie-lands. In the evening we went through some burning woods. They must have been on fire in about a hundred places, but the flames had not yet joined together into one devastating sheet.

Saturday, 4th.—I was awoke by the most disagreeable bumping and jolting, and soon discovered that we were off the line. It took us two hours and many shakings before we got on again. We were now traveling through the flattest of flat prairies, very ugly and very green. About ten o'clock by the new time—for our watches are called upon to change their opinions as to the hour at every place we get to—we found ourselves at Fisher's Landing, and the steamer ready to take us up the Red River.

We have to leave our house-upon-wheels, and to embark upon the boat, which friendly hands have decorated with flags, wreaths of leaves, and flowers. She—the steamer—is a stern-wheeler, such as we had on the Fraser River; she draws very little water, and certainly has an extraordinary passage to perform. The river, which to all intents and purposes is the Red River (the first few miles it is called the Red Lake River), is very muddy, very narrow, and extremely sinuous. I can scarcely convey to you an idea of the extraordinary manner in which it twists and turns itself about: think of a braiding-pattern, or of a zigzag path up a very steep hill; or imagine sailing through hundreds of small ponds all joined together, the second being concealed by the curve of the first, and you may form an idea of it.

I can only tell you that we go from one bank to the other, crushing and crashing against the trees, which grow down to the water-side; the branches sweep over the deck, and fly in our faces, and leave pieces behind them. I had just written this when I gave a shriek as I saw my ink-bottle on the point of being swept overboard by an intrusive tree; and D.'s hat was knocked off his head by it. The consequence of this curious navigation is that we never really go on for more than three minutes at a time: we run against one bank, our steam is shut off, and in some mysterious manner we swing round till our bow is into the other; then we rebound, and go on a few yards, till the sharp curve brings us up against the side. Our stern wheel is very often ashore, and our captain and pilot must require the patience of saints. I told you when the last branch came on board; well, I have been writing as fast as possible since, and now we are ashore on the other side; so you may easily believe that we travel seventeen miles for two that we make, and were it not a lovely day, and had we not a delicious air, I don't know how bad our language might not become.

We were told at St. Paul that we should be eaten with mosquitoes; that no oil, no veils, no gloves, no leggings would keep out the devouring monsters; fancy our delight, then, to find there are none, and that we are able to sit gloveless on deck and write.

We breakfasted early, and were hungry for a one-o'clock lunch, which was more elegant than substantial. Sardines were the pièce de résistance, and ice-cream the most attractive dish to be procured. I hope dinner will be more suited to our appetites.

This exceedingly twisty river is the "Red Lake River"; it is forty miles to travel, though the distance is only twelve from point to point. When we reached the Red River itself, we found the stream wide enough for us to go straight down it, less sinuous, but quite as muddy and uninteresting. Trees come down to the water's edge, and one can see nothing beyond them; behind stretches out the prairie, and every now and then we were just able to see how thin the screen of trees really is between the river and the plains.

Alas! alas! towards evening the mosquitoes appeared, and bit us horribly. At dinner (a very good one) we were eaten while eating, and were very glad to leave the lighted saloon, and sit on the bow of the steamer in the air. The night was very dark, and the river looked gloomy and mysterious, and we sat there and watched the black reflections in the water. Our steamer whistled, and in the distance we heard it answered. Slowly we turned a point and saw another boat approaching us. It looked beautiful in the dark, with two great bull's-eyes, green and red lamps and other lights on deck, creeping towards us; we stopped, and backed into the shore, that it might pass us. It came close and fired off a cannon, and we saw on the deck a large transparency with the words "Welcome, Lord Dufferin" on it, and two girls dressed in white with flags in their hands; then a voice sang "Canada, sweet Canada," and many more voices joined the chorus, and they sang "God save the Queen" and "Rule, Britannia," and cheered for the Governor-General as they began to move slowly away, and he had only just time to call out a few words of thanks before they disappeared into the darkness.

It was very striking, and we scarcely recovered from our surprise and bewilderment before the thing was gone.

Sunday, 5th.—There was a very heavy shower of rain this morning, but happily it cleared up before we reached Pembina; there the American troops were drawn up to receive us, and we went ashore, and up to the Fort, where we saw four ladies and some manœuvres, and spent about an hour. A little way farther, and we passed the line, and found ourselves in Canadian territory again. The first town we came to was Emerson, and we landed there. It seems the people had put up some very pretty arches, but the storm in the morning knocked them all down. We found a platform with carpet on it, and flags all round it, a very good guard of honor (militia), and a very strange one of Indians. Some of the latter were in red coats, some in blankets, some with painted faces, feathers in their hair, beads, medals, etc.; others were more quietly got up, but altogether they formed a most picturesque and curious group. All the ladies of the place were on the platform, and D. received two addresses there, one from the Indians.

We walked down and looked at the women and children, and a second Indian speech was made, and answered. The first described them as very happy and prosperous, the second named some grievance to be redressed.

D. also spoke to the Mennonites (Russians): they are getting on very well, and want to have many more of their people out here. D. explained to them that as far as we are concerned we should be very glad to have them, but that it was impossible for us to take any steps to bring them from their own homes. They are very good settlers, and in addition to the virtues of sobriety and industry they add the advantage of bringing money into the country.

In the afternoon we had prayers on board, and the gentlemen bathed in the Red River; they seemed to enjoy it very much, and stayed in so long that the mosquitoes on shore found us out, and came on board.

We were stationary all night, as we did not want to reach Winnipeg till a reasonable hour in the morning.

At five o'clock the gentlemen got up, and went out duck-shooting, and shot four birds.

We have been very comfortable on board, though our sleeping-cabins are extremely small, and there is scarcely room to turn round in them.

We heard Nellie describe her papa to a girl, who asked her to point out the Governor-General, as "the gentleman in the chimney-pot." She was very anxious to get Colonel Littleton to tell her the Freemason secrets, and, failing, said, with a sigh of relief, "Well, I dare say when women get their rights we shall know them."

My only difficulty is in keeping her at all smart on these occasions, for no sooner is she dressed than she visits the coal-hole, or climbs into some unthought-of place, and returns to me, each of her exploits marked by stains and smudges.

Monday, 6th.—We left our anchorage early in the morning, and came in sight of Fort Garry about ten o'clock. The Red River appears to divide the town in two, but we left it, and turned into the Assiniboine, round the corner of which we found the wharf. We had two hours to wait before landing. Some people came on board to see the Governor-General, and he arranged for me to start half an hour before him, and to go to the City Hall, where we ladies sat till the noise of bands and shouting announced his arrival in a carriage-and-four.

The town of Winnipeg is rapidly increasing, and to-day, with its decorations of transplanted trees and flags, it looked gay and pretty. A very large number of people assembled round the platform, and came along the streets with D., and some very handsome arches had been put up. Addresses were read and answered, the soldiers inspected, and then I got with D. into the carriage, and drove to "Silver Heights," where we are to live.

It is quite five miles from town, along a prairie road, which is a little rough when the weather is dry, but which is simply impassable when there has been rain. The mud here is, from all accounts, fearful. The Lieutenant-Governor, Mr. Morris, told us it once took him nine hours to go eight miles, and two days to do twenty-two miles.

"Our house" is a cottage, and lent to us by Mr. Donald Smith, who met us at the door, introduced us to his daughter, and showed us our accommodation. The A. D. C.s are in a smaller cottage close by, and the men-servants sleep in tents. A fine reception-room, and two ante-rooms, carpeted, papered, and furnished, have been added to the house for us, which we regret, as the place is really too far away to entertain in; nor have we the china, or the knives and forks, wherewith to give a ball or a dinner!

We are near the road, and on the other side of it is the Assiniboine River; we sat on its banks, had tea on the balcony of the house, and spent a very quiet evening. There is a long programme for this week, but it shall develop itself.

Tuesday, 7th.—We went into town to call upon Mrs. Morris, the Lieutenant-Governor's wife. The Government House is surrounded by a wooden palisade, and has a brick gateway, which forms a nice old-fashioned court in front of the house.

In the evening we went to a "Parlor Entertainment"—songs, speeches, and change of costumes—very well done, and amusing. Driving back we realized even more fully than we had done before the disadvantages of living so far from the town. The road is a sort of track on the prairie, and we soon found that we were off it. We asked the other carriage to go first, and the driver replied that he had no lights; our man said his lamps dazzled him, so finally the other carriage did go first. It took us over an hour to get back, and if the four other nights on which we have to go into Winnipeg are dark or wet, I don't know what we shall do.

Wednesday, 8th.—We had a visit from an Indian. He was sent by a chief, who lives twenty-six miles away, to ask when the Governor-General would visit him. The messenger was a fine-looking man. His hair was long, and he wore a fillet round his head with eagles' feathers fastened into it. He had a red-cloth tunic embroidered with beads, with quantities of ermine tails hanging down from all the seams, each tail sewn into the center of a circle of beads. Round his neck he wore a large necklace of bears' claws, moccasins on his feet, and European trousers, which were generally hidden by a large blue blanket, which he pulled round him in very graceful folds. We had rather a long talk with him, and gave him some breakfast; he ate a few mouthfuls, and then asked for paper in which to wrap up the rest. Mrs. Littleton asked him about his religion. He said he had none—that the Indians were here from the Creation, that there was one Great Spirit, but that he found "religion" cost money, and so it was better not to have any. He was given a pound of tea, one of tobacco, his passage home in a steamer, and an order for some provisions on the way.

We drove into Winnipeg to see some games, and were sitting on a platform, and rather enjoying ourselves, when the most desperate shower came on. Our covering was soon soaked through, and we bundled into our carriage as quickly as we could, but not before we were very much damaged; feathers out of curl, dresses dirtied. The people were wonderfully good-tempered; the whole crowd seemed to be in a fit of laughter, and it was amusing to see some holding a bit of sail over them, soldiers with wheelbarrows on their backs for shelter, and others sitting under the shade of a big drum. One sergeant went about in the funniest way, holding a bit of wood over his head, and pretending he could not see from under it. Happily, we had not to go into town again in the evening. Mr. Campbell dined at Winnipeg, and lost his way on the prairie coming back; he got up to his knees in mud, and at last made for a light, and got a shake-down for the night in a farmer's cottage.

Thursday, 9th.—We started off after breakfast to visit the Archbishop on the other side of the river, at St. Boniface. He and his clergy received us at the Palace, where two addresses were read. Then we saw the church, and went on to a convent.

The Grey Sisters have about thirty children under their care; in these thirty there are representatives of eleven different nationalities. Each child had a little flag with "Welcome" written in her own tongue upon it. There were Canadian French, English, Irish, half-breeds, and different Indian tribes.

The weather was really nice, and we sat on the balcony until it was time to dress for the ball at Government House. We were asked at nine o'clock, and went punctually, but "in honor of us" the other people were late, and we stood about for a long time before the dancing began. A fine room had been put up for the occasion, and everything went off very well.

All the ladies were well dressed, and the dancing as at Ottawa or London. Six years ago, at a ball here, ladies would have come in moccasins, and danced nothing but the Red River jig. This state of society would have had some charm for us, but the change shows how rapidly the place grows, and how quickly outside ideas make their way in. The jig was danced for us; it is exactly the same as an Irish jig. The supper was good, and the table prettily decorated with flowers. The fruit had to be imported, as none grows here yet. The Roman Catholic and English bishops both came to the ball for a few minutes.

The drive back was very dark in spite of a fine display of lightning on the horizon. The second carriage drove up against a post, and broke a spring, and Captain Smith had to jump down every now and then to see if we were on the road, and the driver kept "wishing he was at home."

Friday, 10th.—We held a reception at the City Hall at three o'clock. It did not last very long, but as we had to attend a concert in the evening we decided to dine at the hotel, and not to drive out to Silver Heights. The hotel-keeper insisted upon giving us our dinner free.

Mrs. Littleton and I went over the Fort, and through the Hudson Bay Stores. The shop is a very good one, and I purchased a hat for my rough expeditions, and a jacket of white caribou-skin, embroidered in silk by the Indians. We also saw the furs. The room full of buffalo-robés smelt horribly; but I bore it, being determined to see all I could. I believe the smell is not altogether from the skins, but is mixed with the odor of the Indian camp. Another place was full of various skins: wolf, grizzly bear, cinnamon bear, foxes of all sorts, etc.

The concert was "classical," and its great merit was the shortness of it.

Nellie spent the afternoon at the Government House, where there are three children, but she dined with the grown-up people, and enjoyed herself very much.

Saturday, 11th.—There were races to-day at Buffalo Park, and happily the changeable climate did not spoil them. They were held in a large piece of prairie, walled in by a stout paling; numbers of people were there, and we had a capital stand for seeing everything.

The races were the least interesting part of the performance, though they were rather lively, for the riders shouted as they galloped; there was no such mystery as "pulling," and every one went as fast as he could.

What we most enjoyed seeing was a man lassoing a wild cow. He rode beautifully, and sent the lasso round her horns; after holding her thus, and riding about a little, he laid her gently over on her side, unable to get up. Then he let her go, but left the lasso fastened to her horns, and as he rode fast after her he stooped to the ground and picked the end of it up. Once he took hold of the cow's tail, and held it for some time. He put the animal down again in front of our stand, and a quantity of men rushed forward to undo the cord which was twisted tight round her; the people gathered in about them, and as soon as the cow was loose there was such a stampede! She knocked over two men, but they were not hurt, and there was great laughter.

Three buffaloes were on the field in a state of semi-wildness; these were cantered round to exhibit themselves, but the owner would not allow them to be lassoed lest they should turn savage. We were surprised to see how fast they could run, and how well they could jump, for their big heads do not give them a very active appearance.

Sunday, 12th.—Went to church, and arrived there in time to escape a tremendous storm of rain. I never saw such a climate: one may be wet through on the finest day.

Monday, 13th.—We drove over to St. Boniface to see a rifle-match. The day was perfectly lovely when we started, not a cloud in the sky, and such a hot sun; nevertheless, I took my waterproof and umbrella, and sure enough the clouds gathered, and a thunderstorm came on with rain ! We were received in an arbor erected for the occasion, an address was read, and I fired a shot, which was off the target, but which was marked a bull's-eye, and then the match began. In two or three minutes after we had been baked in the sun, the rain came on, and we had to retire into a large shed, where we lunched, and D. replied to a speech proposing his health, and then, as the rain continued, we drove home.

In the evening we had a visit from eight or ten Indians, who came to dance and sing before us. Their faces were most elaborately painted, and they came up the road uttering the most extraordinary cries. The men were fine, good-looking, and tall, of the Sioux nation. They all came over from the States fifteen years ago. They had feathers in their hair, and we are told that each white feather represents a white man's scalp taken by the wearer, and a colored feather stands for an Indian's scalp. When they reached our door they sat down on the grass and hung their drum upon some stakes they brought for the purpose; then half of them sat down, and the others danced round, while the sitters beat the drum, and the whole company shouted. They kept this up for a few minutes, and after a little rest began the same thing over and over again. We dismissed them when we had seen enough, but D. promised to go to their camp in the morning.

Tuesday, 14th.—We had to leave home immediately after breakfast, as His Ex. had to lay the foundation-stone of a ladies' college. On our way we stopped at the Indian encampment, one large half-covered tent, with twenty men and women sleeping in it. The men did not seem to have completed their toilet, and were still putting on their feathers, and having their hair plaited. There were some new devices on their faces.

D. promised them some powder and shot, and then we drove on.

The Bishop of Rupert's Land is building a girls' school. He is already the head, and entire manager, of a very successful college for boys, and after the usual ceremonies attendant upon laying a stone we drove to see it. A very nice set of boys received us at the door, and showed us into the house, which, for this country, is a very old-fashioned one. It is on the banks of the Red River.

The Bishop gave us lunch, and then we returned to the hotel at Winnipeg, where we dress for the ball given by the citizens to-night.

We dined with the Governor, and were escorted to the ball by a torchlight procession. The City Hall was beautifully decorated, and a large supper-room was built for the occasion, and made to look like a tent, with red, white, and blue material. The room and floor were very good, the ladies well dressed, and the whole thing most successful.

Wednesday, 15th.—We have had a very pleasant day on the prairie. We managed to shake off our sleepiness after the ball, and to be quite ready for an early start. D. and I got into a small phaeton, Mrs. Littleton, Nellie, and Alexander into an ambulance wagon, and our three gentlemen mounted their horses, and off we went, with a twenty-eight-stone-weight gentleman in a buggy to guide us. We went through Winnipeg, and drove past the Bishop's College, where we were yesterday, and so on to the illimitable prairie.

It is covered with long grasses and wild flowers, and is flat as the sea, parts of it so swampy that our horses seemed to have difficulty in pulling us through it. It has a peculiar smell, and there is a delightful air upon it, and one begins to feel the freedom-of-the-savage raising one's spirits. We drove in this way for three hours (the servants following), our only adventure being the fall of Captain Smith's horse, and his narrow escape of being run over by the ambulance.

Have I told you that we are bound for the Penitentiary at Rockwood? The building is erected on "the big, stony mountain," which is really only a rise of eighty feet above the level of the prairie. It is limestone rock, and descends quite suddenly on the other side—like a precipice—back to the great plain-level.

When we got within half a mile of the place, we were met by some gentlemen, who said they wished us to arrive in a vehicle peculiar to the country—namely, a Red River cart. These are made entirely of wood, and this one was ornamented with boughs, and was drawn by eighty oxen! D. and I, Mrs. Littleton and Nellie, got in, and our eighty beasts, each conducted by a man with ribbons round his hat, began to move off. It was such fun, and looked so very pretty and picturesque. Sometimes an ox would become a little troublesome, but he was soon brought to order, and I felt like a barbarian princess as I drove along in this carriage of primitive magnificence.

We passed through a beautiful triumphal arch, made of grain, with a spinning-wheel, plow, and other agricultural implements on the top of it. D. here got out, and answered the address, and then we returned to our triumphal car, and drove on, attended by a crowd, to the doors of the prison. A very handsome arch had been put up about a hundred yards from it, and fifty yards nearer to the house was another: these two were connected with chains of green rope, hung from poles with flags on them, and a new road ran between the two, which is the first part of a road to Winnipeg. I was asked to open it, and was presented with a spade. I emptied some earth out of a smart little barrow, and then we all went in to lunch.

Our hostess is a half-breed lady, pretty, and very nice, and her husband, Mr. Bedson, is the warden of this prison. They gave us an excellent lunch, and the usual toasts. In his speech D. told them that he much preferred going to jail in a cart to leaving it in one.

After this, we walked on the prairie, to breathe the delicious air, and looked at the snake-hole, where, Mrs. Bedson told me, they had killed 360 snakes in three days in the spring! It seems to be a rendezvous, where the snakes appear suddenly, half frozen with the winter cold. We looked at the prisoners' garden, but when I proposed to look at the prison I was told all the people were asleep.

We were dreadfully sleepy ourselves, and were actually in the enjoyment of "forty winks" in our very comfortable bedrooms when our dinner was announced, about nine o'clock. The guardians of the penitentiary had arranged some fireworks, and we sat upon the prairie watching them until bedtime.

Thursday, 16th.—At eleven o'clock last night there was the most beautiful cloudless, starlit sky, but I was awoke by a terrific thunderstorm, peals of thunder, and flashes of vivid lightning. The driver of one of our wagons was knocked down by the shock of one crash, and on our way to St. Andrews to-day we came across the body of a cow killed by lightning. It was enormously swollen, but the mud in its hoofs was quite moist.

We breakfasted at eight, and went over the building. It is quite new, and the men's department is beautiful to look at. At present it is very expensive, as there are fourteen officials to fourteen prisoners. The women's cells are not nearly so good as the men's, and I felt the more sorry for this, as the one inmate was a wretched lunatic.

We said good-by to Mr. and Mrs. Bedson and drove off over the prairie again. The storm had passed, and the day was lovely. About two we reached St. Andrews, one of the oldest settlements in the province. It is on the banks of the Red River, and is very prettily situated. We found an arch, or rather bower, there, made of branches, flags, and colored cloths ; the platform inside it was circular, so all the people could see us. D. replied to the address, and then we shook hands with every one, and Nellie and I were presented with bouquets in pretty Indian "roggins." A very good lunch, on the teetotal principle, was given us, and our healths were drunk in water. Two mottoes in the luncheon-room were, "Kit Atumiskatinan," which means "We welcome you," in the Cree language; the other was—

Native, or English, Canadian we,
Teuton, or Celt, or whatever we be,
We are all of us loyal in our welcome to thee.

The young lady who presented me with the bouquet made me a long speech in Cree, trembling violently the while, and a girl in the school who read a poem of welcome was almost speechless with fright. Then I gave the prizes at a ladies' school, and after this we got into our carriage again, and drove five miles more along the banks of the Red River to the "Little Stone Fort" where we slept. A very sad thing happened here last Dominion Day (July 1st). Owing to the explosion of some gunpowder, five children belonging to the Fort were killed, and our hosts, Mr. and Mrs. Flett, lost two, so they are very depressed. I hope our visit and the consequent bustle and change may do the poor woman good.

This is one of the Hudson's Bay stores, and is quite a fortified place. We all enjoy the air so much, and have had another very pleasant day. I have written this out on the balcony, while our rooms are being prepared. We have our own cook and provisions, so we are not such an invasive army as we appear. D. is drawing, Nellie climbing up everywhere to look into everything, the others walking about seeing the sights. It is a very restful evening after our journey.

Friday, 17th.—We got into our wagons directly after breakfast, and started on our way, rejoicing in the beautiful weather.

When we had gone about five miles we came to signs of festivity: flags flying, and sounds of music, Indian warriors dancing in time to the band, and uttering their own extraordinary shouts. They were curious-looking creatures; most of their legs were naked, though so covered with paint that they looked clothed. One had his legs of a dull white color, with large black bands spread over them. Another had black stripes. The upper man was variously dressed: either a cotton shirt, or colored pieces of cloth, or shawls were worn; the heads had feathers stuck about them, and the faces were elaborately painted. The most striking decoration I saw was a large green caterpillar, painted crawling up a man's cheek, and losing itself in his eye. The chief wore the coat which I described to you in a former letter, and which he had then lent to one of his followers when he sent him to ask us to come and see him. This band of brethren are pagans (from economical motives), and are not very good friends with the Christian Indians we are on our way to see.

From the place where we met this strange assembly we went slowly, followed by the crowd, through the town of Selkirk, to the place where another large arch, surmounted by railway implements, was erected; for this is the spot where the great Pacific Railway is to cross the Red River; then we got on to a platform, and had an address, and looked at all these Indians, and went through the regular business of presentations, etc.

We next drove on towards the Indian Reserve, and at its entrance were saluted by a large deputation, who came to welcome us there. One was a splendid man with a large necklace of feathers, bare legs, and squares of beaded cloth gracefully covering the rest of his body. He had in his hand a standard, like a gigantic hand-screen; it was a long pole with a stiff fringe of feathers the whole way down it, and red cloth setting it off as a trimming.

We stopped for lunch soon after this, and spent a couple of hours very pleasantly sitting about on the grass, before we walked on to the grand "Pow-wow" place. The chief is called by the unromantic name of "Henry Prince," and is a gentleman in a fine red coat, and with two enormous medals on his breast. He received us in an arbor platform, and gave D. a very pretty address, which he answered, each of his sentences being translated. This over, the chief asked to speak, and then he made a long oration, telling all his grievances. D. told him to write them down, and send them to him on paper. We went into the school, and heard a hymn sung and saw a canoe-race. We walked all round the camp, to visit the women and children. The little babies have their legs packed in dry moss, and are then tied up tight in a sort of back-board. D. had two guns and two watches to present to chiefs, and on his own behalf he gave four bullocks for a feast, so we left them all in good spirits, while we had a pleasant drive back, getting to Stone Fork at six o'clock.

Saturday, 18th.—We had a long drive home from “Stone Fort” and got to Silver Heights in the afternoon.

Sunday, 19th.—The Bishop of Rupert’s Land preached at Winnipeg, and came back to lunch with us.

Monday, 20th.—Another expedition! The first thing we heard this morning was the sound of rain, and when we got up the day looked most unpromising; however, we started about ten, the four gentlemen riding, Mrs. Littleton and her maid, Nellie and I in the ambulance drawn by four horses. We got on very well for the first three hours, when we came to some fearful swamps. Our horses plunged through water and mud, the wheels of our carriage sinking, first on one side and then on the other; two or three times the horses in the carts sat down in despair, and once they sunk so deep in the mire that the whole caravan had to stop and help to pull them out. The rain came on in torrents, and there was thunder growling overhead. Altogether it was not a nice day for camping out. We expected to reach our destination at two, and to lunch there, but owing to our adventures in the bogs we did not get there till five, and we were all wet and famished. The Lieutenant-Governor had arrived before, and he gave us shelter and some tea, which revived us; then the rain cleared off, we made up a nice fire, and things began to look better. Our cook had been in the most unfortunate cart, and had been over his knees in water most of the day, but the moment he arrived he lit his fire, and made us a dinner of good soup, mutton chops, and potatoes. It was next discovered that three tents had been left behind—three out of six; however, we managed very well without them. D., Nelly, and I had one tent, Mrs. Littleton and her maid another (our maids take the expeditions in turns—mine came last time), and the three gentlemen the third. We had stretcher-beds, with buffalo-robés and blankets on them, and dry hay on the floor, so we were really very comfortable. Our camping ground is near water, half river, half swamp, and as we can get wood, water, and milk, we shall return here for another night on our way back. I rather dread going through those bogs again !

Tuesday, 21st.—We were awoke rather early by the noises of camp-life ; wood being chopped up, conversations going on in every tent, etc., and I had some difficulty in keeping Nellie in bed till the orthodox hour of seven, but, as I am very much afraid of her being overtired on this expedition, I have to insist upon this. The weather was much better—the sun shone, but the wind was very cold. It was nearly ten before everything was packed, and we were on our way to the Mennonite settlement. Four of these men met us on horseback, some way from their farms, and rode before us through their Reserve. You know that the Mennonites have left Russia for conscientious reasons, in the same way that they left their native land, Germany, and settled in Russia, because they will not fight, and these two countries require that their subjects should serve in the army. The Mennonites are most desirable immigrants ; they retain their best German characteristics, are hard-working, honest, sober, simple, hardy people ; they bring money into the country, and can settle in a woodless place, which no other people will do. Necessity (in Russia) has taught them to make a peculiar fuel—cakes of manure, mixed with straw—which is kept a whole year to dry thoroughly, and which looks exactly like turf ; with this they get through the long Canadian winter without wood or coal. They speak nothing but German, and are Lutheran, to which form of religion they add the Quakers' non-fighting doctrine. They dress in the plainest and least decorative fashion ; the women, from their birth to their graves, tie up their heads in colored handkerchiefs fastened under their chins, and wear dark-colored stuff gowns, the baby's being made after the same fashion as its mother's. The men shave, and wear black stocks round their throats. Partly in consequence of this unbecoming costume, all the people, men and women, are plain. One hundred and twenty families arrived in Canada three years ago and settled on this bare prairie one autumn day. For a week they had not a roof to cover them, and slept under their carts; then they dug up the sods, and with them made rude huts, in which they lived through one of our long and severe winters. This is, therefore, their third year here—and now I will tell you how we find them situated.

We drove about five miles through their Reserve, which is eighteen miles square, and in so doing passed through five or six villages of farmhouses; they are not in streets, each house being surrounded by land. The houses are cottages, very plainly built, roofed with very thick hay thatch, the walls wooden, but covered with plaster. Next to and opening into the living-house is a large building in which the cattle spend the winter.

Everything looks very neat; home-made wooden furniture, flowers in the windows, nice gardens, etc. Each family is given 160 acres of land, and the way in which they work their farms enables them to do so very advantageously.

Supposing there are twenty families in a village, they put all the land together, and mark out the different spots which are best suited to particular crops; thus, all the pasture is in one part, all the potatoes in another, and so on. Each man, however, works his own share of each crop, and has his profit to himself. Their church is most simple—plain deal forms without backs, and no ornament anywhere.

After driving through these prosperous-looking villages, and passing through great corn-fields, we saw before us on the open prairie an arbor erected and in front of it at least 700 people. The men stood on one side with specimens of their farm produce before them, corn grown from Russian seed, from Canadian seed, flax, etc. The women on the other side showed their garden produce. The babies and children were out too. In the arbor were three girls, with lace handkerchiefs on their heads, and trays with glasses in their hands, ready to offer us some Russian tea, which was most refreshing after our cold drive. The arbor was very prettily hung with garlands of flowers and bunches of corn mixed with poppies, and there were tables all round it, and little Christmas-trees, on which hung bouquets with some German lines of welcome wrapped round each, the whole most charmingly done. Mr. Hespeler, the Mennonite agent, who arranged the whole of this immigration, was with us, and acted as interpreter. The Mennonites' most learned man read, and Mr. Hespeler translated, a very nice address, and D. replied in a speech which delighted them greatly. They never cheered, but when anything pleased them they lifted their caps. In allusion to their peculiar tenets he said: "You have come to a land where you will find the people with whom you are to associate engaged indeed in a great struggle, and contending with foes whom it requires their best energies to encounter. But those foes are not your fellow-men, nor will you be called upon in the struggle to stain your hands with human blood—a task so abhorrent to your religious feelings. The war to which we invite you as recruits and comrades is a war waged against the brute-forces of nature: but those forces will welcome our domination, and reward our attack by placing their treasures at our disposal. It is a war of ambition—for we intend to annex territory—but neither blazing villages nor devastated fields will mark our ruthless track; our battalions will march across the illimitable plains which stretch before us as sunshine steals athwart the ocean; the rolling prairie will blossom in our wake, and corn and peace and plenty will spring where we have trod. . . . In one word, beneath the flag whose folds now wave above us, you will find protection, peace, civil and religious liberty, constitutional freedom, and equal laws."

We walked round, and muttered a few lame German sentences, and were as speechlessly polite as we could be. This being over, after a song from the school-children, Mr. Hespeler asked us over to his camp-fire, where we had Rhine wine and German cake, and where he gave hot coffee to the women who had come from a distance. Nellie made love to all the babies, and having nursed one for some time, its mother presented her with a cucumber. It was very pleasant sitting by the fire and seeing the people enjoying their coffee on the grass. After an hour and a half spent here we walked to our camp, a quarter of a mile off. Some women showed us their houses, and then we dined, and sat round our own fire. Presently we saw fireworks rising from the other camp, and so we got up an enormous torch, which was seen and responded to by a distant cheer, and one line of "He is a jolly good fellow."

The only other thing I have to say about the Mennonites is that the great proportion of those here are young, and that everybody has at least six children. Think what a gain they are to this country: in three years to have eighteen square miles of country settled by such people!

Wednesday, 22d.—Our camp is on good ground, and we all slept very comfortably, and longer than we did the first night. We were packed up about ten, and set off to drive through some more villages. Mr. Hespeler took us into one house, and showed us the domestic arrangements. The only fault to find with these is that the stables open into the living-rooms. The inhabitants will gradually leave off this nasty plan, but it is their devotion to their cattle which makes them wish to have them so near. The village herd and the village school-master are the only two paid laborers in the Mennonite vineyard: the clergyman receives no pay. School is not kept during the three summer months.

We reached our new camping-ground early in the day, and the gentlemen went out shooting; they got a mixed but not a good bag—prairie chicken, snipe, plover, duck, and a bittern, the latter quite delicious to eat. In the evening we sat over our camp-fire, and Mr. McKay told us some very interesting stories of his life. I must introduce him to you, for he is (to use a very Yankee expression) the “boss” of our party. He arranges everything for us, provides the horses, carriages, tents, beds, etc.

The Hon. James McKay, M. P. (in the local Parliament), has been a mighty hunter in his day, but as he now weighs 320 lbs, he leads a quieter though still a very active life. He has a pleasant face, and is very cheery, and a thorough “good fellow,” but so enormous! It is curious to see him filling up his buggy, and driving on before us, steering us through the bogs, and making signs to our driver to avoid danger on the way. His boy of eleven rides on a pony with him, and promises to be as large. I never saw such a fat boy.

Mr. McKay is a half-breed. His parents had some French blood in them, and he speaks the three languages, but I believe he talks Indian at home. He has lost one thumb, and besides this gunshot wound he has had several other very narrow escapes of his life. One day he and an English gentleman killed seven grizzly bears: there was a bag! Mr. McKay shot four, and the Englishman three; but what seems to me the most wonderful feat is that he once killed a mother and two young cubs with a lasso. He had no gun with him, and the great bear came towards him on her hind paws; he threw the lasso over her head, and, turning his horse quickly away, pulled her over on her back, and strangled her; then he killed the cubs too.

He said he thought nothing of it, as he had killed a black bear with a lasso when he was fourteen years old. "Jemmie" (his fat boy) is always practicing picking things off the ground when he is on horseback, with a view to future excellence with the lasso. Mr. McKay knows a great deal about the Indians, and it was very interesting to hear him talk of them.

Thursday, 23d.—We had about twenty-five miles to drive home, and as we got a good deal shaken we were very tired at night and ready to go very early to bed after reaching Silver Heights. The younger gentlemen, however, having gone to Mr. McKay's to see about some shooting, found dancing going on, and amused themselves by trying to learn the Red River jig.

CHAPTER XIX.

MANITOBA.

Saturday, August 25th.—Mrs. Morris and her daughters lunched with us, and we had a visit from an American Professor, who has come here to study the manners and customs of the “hopper.” As I have not a great deal of personal interest to tell you about to-day, I will try to instruct you in Manitoban zoölogy and entomology. You have of course heard of the grasshopper plague which devastates this country year after year. The creature is simply a hideous grasshopper, but he comes in such extraordinary numbers that he literally clears all before him—crops of all sorts, bark of young trees, leaves, buds, flowers, window-curtains, ladies’ dresses. Nothing escapes his great appetite and ostrich-like powers of digestion. He flies into your face, he climbs up your garments, he sits upon your food, he lets you walk upon him, drive over him, slay him by thousands, but still he forms a thick covering over your palings, and darkens the air with his devouring presence. He has but one merit—no, two: he does not bite you, and (if you can make up your mind to eat him) the Professor declares he is good to eat.

The creature is supposed to be brought here by one “prevailing” wind and taken away by another. For two years (after fourteen of annual visitation) the people here have had a rest from him, and the crops are flourishing.

The common fly is a great nuisance too. We call him the "house" fly, but he also swarms on the prairie. He wakes us in the morning, assists at our breakfast, worries us while we write, and makes himself thoroughly objectionable, as a fly well knows how to do.

In speaking of the mosquito I must change my pronoun, for the Professor declares that it is only the fair ladies who bite. She is a real plague in this country, but we are fortunate enough to have escaped her almost entirely. An Englishman came out last year for pleasure, but after three days' journey into the land he turned back, finding only pain, and literally defeated by the attacks of the mosquitoes. I am told that they often kill animals by choking them, and that when so killed, a great ball of mosquitoes will be taken out of a cow's throat. This may be too interesting a fact for you to digest: stay-at-home people are so incredulous.

Cows and horses have even a more fearful enemy in what is called here the "bulldog," but what we call the "horse-fly." They really do kill horses by the irritation they cause. Mr. McKay told us that by scraping his hand along the back of his horse he has taken off one hundred and seventy-three at once (don't smile!); and he described to us the mane of a horse standing on end with the crowds of flies in the hair, one on the top of the other, all struggling for blood. These nasty things come into the houses too, later in the year. I am very happy to add that the Professor says that blood is injurious to all these creatures, and that they are punished when they give way to their unhealthy appetites.

There are no rats and no earthworms in Manitoba, but there are squirrels which come into the houses, and I am told that mice are plentiful, and are particularly fond of making a nest in one's best gown.

Oxen are much used as beasts of burden, and one sees a few mules.

Monday, 27th.—The gentlemen went out shooting for the whole day, and came back well pleased, though they were unable to find half the birds they shot. It came on to pour in the evening, and they lost one good hour's sport.

We ladies lunched with the Morrises, and met Mr. Macpherson and Mr. Campbell, who have come all the way here by water (three weeks in canoes); we are going over part of the same route, so they were able to give us some hints. Mr. Macpherson did not like it, and three weeks of pork and canoe-made bread made him ill. They fortunately had lime-juice with them.

Tuesday, 28th.—We drove through rather a pleasant country, a wooded prairie, making our way towards the Winnipeg River, and did twenty-nine miles in the day. Our camping-ground is on the banks of a winding stream, and we were just settling down when we heard that one of the horses had fallen into the river. We went to look at the poor brute, floundering up to his neck in mud; he was getting very much exhausted, and we were almost afraid the men would be unable to save him, but they did manage to get him out. Another misfortune was that a cart, containing the men's food and bedding, broke down on the way, and did not arrive till very late; and a third that my maid is ill. She has been so for a few days, but said nothing, and to-night she has a fearful headache.

Wednesday, 29th.—Alexander is still very ill, and naturally thinks everything very horrid, camp-beds too hard, tin cups nasty; she touches everything with the points of her fingers, and makes a face over everything she tastes; she really is ill, and I hope she will like this life better when she is well.

We expected to go through a number of swamps, but the weather has been so dry that happily there were none to speak of. We had not gone more than two miles when a whole cavalcade of horsemen met us. They wore red sashes across their shoulders, and rode on Indian saddles, much embroidered with beads. There was one little boy on an enormous horse, which nearly pulled him off when it attempted to eat, which it did often. The horses are not trained much, and have very hard mouths. These riders were French half-breeds, and looked very Indian. They rode beautifully, and galloped by us for over two miles, firing a feu-de-joie every few minutes. When we got near to St. Andrews we found that the people had made an impromptu avenue of trees fully a mile long, and at the end of it an arch decorated with arms and welcomes. This settlement looks very flourishing and well cultivated. The people read a French address, and D. replied in the same language. Then an English one was read, and answered. After this we went on, accompanied for some way by our cavaliers, and after they left us we halted and had lunch.

About five o'clock we reached our camping-ground, having driven thirty miles, and having had one little interval of prairie-shooting on the way. When the horses were unharnessed we all set to work: the gentlemen pitched the tents, we picked up sticks, and made two fires, and then I made four beds, and plucked a duck for dinner! This meal was highly appreciated by us all, and we sat round the fire and listened to some of Mr. McKay's stories. The gentlemen were made very angry by hearing that at seven in the morning a bear was seen quite close to our camp! The men thought of telling them, but did not, and it was so close they could easily have got it. Was not that provoking?

The prairie-fowl shooting is very odd. The birds remain in the grass quite close to the sportsman, and stare at him till he makes them get up, and then sometimes they flop down again before any one can shoot. Yesterday, the mother of the brood which had been ruthlessly shot down sat calling for her young, and looking about quite close to us.

Thursday, 30th.—Traveling on the Dawson route. A hot day, and the road dusty and extremely rough. We were very tired by two o'clock, when we stopped at a sort of half-way house to rest and have lunch. The hostess was a Norwegian, with five children—four most charming, pretty little girls, the fifth, a baby, seven days old! She, poor woman, had got up to decorate her room for us, and to make flags. She seemed such a nice person, and she wept bitterly when we left. Of course she was very weak, and she lives in a very lonely place, and was glad to see some one to speak to; her prospects are not good, as her husband is delicate, and does not seem to get on. They are just going to move to the Pembina Mountains, where they have taken up a farm of 160 acres. Neither he nor she knows anything of farming, and when they reach the place they will have to build a house. We named the Norwegian baby Frederica. The other children had made a train in the yard, with a piece of stone for an engine, snow-shoes and boxes for carriages, etc. When D. saw it he asked for tickets, which one child instantly produced, and which everybody, entering into the spirit of the game, bought. They immediately took the money to their mother, and we were able to please them with some little necklaces we had for the Indians. Johann Nord is the father's name.

During the afternoon-half of our journey we passed through a bush fire, but not close enough to the actual blaze to be very much annoyed by the smoke. We did not get to our camping-ground till six, and then we had some new experiences, for there was no water and no food for the horses. We had to dig for the former, and Mr. McKay tried to take his horses somewhere for better grass, but they would not leave the carts, where they hoped to find corn.

This part of the country is wooded, and there is no scenery at all.

We are in Keewatin now. It is governed by a council, and has not a Lieutenant-Governor of its own, though Mr. Morris is what is called the "Administrator."

Friday, 31st.—Before lunch we did about seventeen miles, and as the road was rough we were glad of the rest in the middle of the day. When we started again, we were told that we had only nine miles to go, and thought we should have such an easy afternoon. It proved a very hard one. We had five miles of swamp, and a road made with rough-hewn trunks of trees. When first made this sort of perpetual bridge is not disagreeable, but when time has worn furrows in it the joggling of the ambulance wagon upon it is not to be described!

When we had been knocked about as much as we could bear we got out and walked a couple of miles; but almost our whole journey was over corduroy road, and as we had to go at a foot's pace, it was very fatiguing.

As you may guess, a "corduroy" road is a Brobdingnagian imitation of the material worn by rough little boys, and when an occasional "cord" has broken away altogether, when another has got loose, and turns round as the horse puts his foot on it, or when it stands up on end as the wheel touches it, the corduroy road is not pleasant to drive many miles over! In consequence of our slow progress, it was quite dark when we reached our camping-ground, and the cook did not arrive till half-past seven.

Saturday, September 1st.—Ten or twelve miles of rough road brought us to the North-West Angle, where we found a beautifully decorated steamer on the Lake of the Woods.

There were a few Indians about: one who is always called “Colonel Wolseley,” because he was guide to Sir Garnet, on the Red River Expedition.

We had got up at six in order to do our steamer voyage by daylight; but our horses wandered away in the night, and it took some time to catch them, so that it was one o’clock before we had done the twelve miles, and packed our things into the boat. We had to part with Mr. McKay here, and to put ourselves into the hands of twenty-six canoe-men. They all came on board at the North-West Angle, which is a morsel of the United States mixed up with our land.

We had such a pleasant afternoon in the steamer. The Lake of the Woods, about which we had heard nothing, proved to be quite lovely; islands innumerable, rocky and wooded, a great variety of shapes and sizes, sometimes far away, and sometimes so close to the steamer as quite to darken it. We lunched and dined on board, and did not land until it was dark, and the setting-up of our camp was most difficult. We could only get three tents up, and I had to be one of four in mine, so we were rather crowded.

I found that we were close to the house of one of our Ottawa brides, who has come out here with her husband. She was a Miss Ashworth, and he a Mr. Fellowes. We went up to see her, and found her very happy and cheerful. She has one neighbor nine miles away, and a second eighteen miles off.

Sunday, 2d.—We had such a pleasant day after once we had got into our canoes and were well started. The weather was lovely, and the River Winnipeg beautiful. We have two large and two small canoes. The first big one carries D. and Nellie and me, and eight men, and a good deal of luggage; the second, Colonel and Mrs. Littleton, and eight men. The first small one had the two A. D. C.'s, Nowell, and six men; and the other small one held three servants and six men—that is to say, there ought to be six men in the two small ones, but two left us, so our servants take it in turns at the paddles. We were most comfortable, and lay back reading and looking at the scenery, and occasionally doing a little sleeping. Sometimes the men sang the Canadian boat-songs which sound so delightful on the water, and sometimes they cheered themselves up by racing the other canoes. Our tents, luggage, and provisions are distributed over all the boats. In the middle of the day we landed to lunch, and at five we stopped on a piece of ground where Sir Garnet Wolseley and his troops once camped. Nellie and I had a nice bathe, and returned to find our camp full of activity; our twenty-four men, and four gentlemen and three servants hard at work chopping wood, putting up tents, mending canoes, cooking dinners, and making beds. The latter is a most important office. The bed-maker gets a quantity of dry grass and small branches of fir, which are laid one over the other so as to form a spring mattress. A buffalo-robe goes over that, and then blankets ad libitum.

We had dinner of hot soup, curry, stewed beef, duck, and prairie chicken, and a blueberry pudding, our cook having got up early to pick the blueberries. The soup and the beef were carried here in tins, the game has been shot on the way. Monsieur Beselin, our cook, has done so well. When we were driving he used to arrive sometimes long after us, when it was quite dark, and in five minutes' time he would be hard at work, and our dinner well under way. Mr. McKay, who is a great traveler, said he never saw a man who could produce a dinner so expeditiously, and get his things packed up again so quickly. In addition to this, he is always in a good humor, and in the daytime now he paddles away with a beaming countenance.

Strange to say, though on the banks of a splendid river, we have no good drinking-water, and are obliged to suck it through a sort of baby's-bottle filter! In the matter of drink we are badly off; we have brought no wine, so as to lessen our luggage; we have no milk (except preserved milk), and, as I said before, good water is hard to get. Tea is our principal beverage, but without milk it is not very nice. We also have chocolate (which makes us thirsty).

Monday, 3d.—Up at six; lovely morning; the gentlemen bathed, and we got off on our travels by 8.30. We had another delightful day. We made two portages, and at the end of the second we lunched; a waterfall, which we escaped by our portage, was really a very pretty and important one; and after lunch we went over such an exciting rapid: it was a great dip, the other part of the water being quite smooth, and we seemed to slide over it, and then to plunge into a stormy sea, the canoe gallantly rising to the waves. At this one there were great cries of "Back water!" and energetic signs made to the canoes behind us to avoid a certain rock on the way. Later on we had another very exciting descent, where the stream carried us at a fearful pace sharp round a rock; we were all covered with water-proofs, and some of the canoes shipped a good deal of water.

The scenery is beautiful: the Winnipeg seldom looks like a river, but nearly always like a lovely lake full of islands. They are rocky and wooded, and sometimes there are steep precipices of rock. The foliage is varied (not all pine), and the delightful weather helps to make it all charming.

We camped at five, and the usual busy scenes were enacted. I watched the way the men kneaded their bread, and then I made a loaf; they use a little baking-powder, and pour the water actually into the sack of flour, and do all the kneading in the top of it; then they spread the dough out in a frying-pan, and put it before a good fire. A very nice sort of cake is the result. Pemmican soup is another of their dishes, and really it is not at all bad, and it is very (excuse the word) "filling," which is a great advantage.

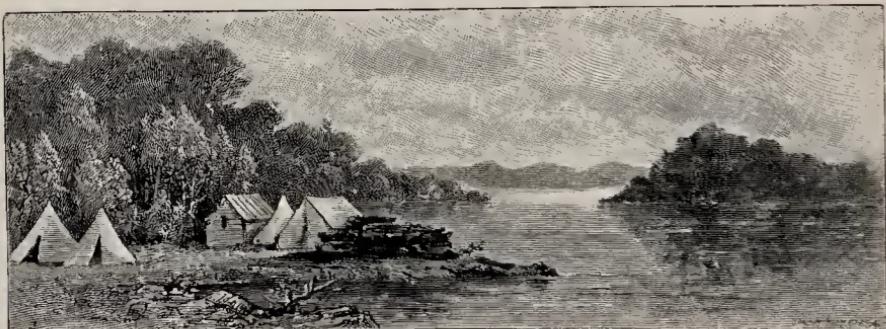

It is wonderful how quickly these men put up our tents, especially as they have to cut down trees to make room for them. I don't think they were half an hour getting them up to-night, lighting all the fires, and unpacking all the things. Each crew has its own cook and mess.

We stopped at a small Mission we saw on the way, to get some milk. It is called the "White Dog Mission," and a half-breed clergyman lives there. His wife has been ill a year, has never seen a doctor, and is now on her back in a birch-bark tent, where she thinks she has more air than in a house. I went in to see her: she can speak English a little, but did not seem to have more comfortable surroundings than an Indian. We were sorry we had no doctor with us to help the poor thing, and such cases make one realize the hardship of living in these lonely parts.

Tuesday, 4th.—The weather and the delights of our journey have been much the same as on the last two days. The only events were the view of one most lovely waterfall, and some fine rapids. At the fall the river was about half a mile wide, and the fall stretched the whole way across. It is really an enormous rapid, but except in height, it is one of the finest waterfalls I have seen. We portaged across, and got into our canoes again at the foot of it.

There was one rapid which D. went down but would not allow me to try, as there was some danger that one might be swept into a whirlpool and upset; but all the canoes got safely through it.

RAT PORTAGE.

We have just camped at a portage for the night. We landed at one side of an island, and the canoes and all our goods were carried to the other side of it; there we found ourselves (to use geographical language, without really studying the points of the compass) "bounded on the north" by a waterfall, flowing from us; on the south by a great rapid and a wood; wood on the east, and an island filling up the space between the Rapid and the Fall on the west. To-morrow we have to row across the little basin, and portage to the bottom of the Fall.

This Winnipeg surpasses all rivers I have ever seen, being so much more beautiful than the other large rivers and lakes I have been on. We enjoy our days immensely, and are sorry we have only two more of this delightful life.

D. is so industrious about drawing; he has made a quantity of pretty sketches.

Wednesday, 5th.—I tried to describe to you the situation of our camping-ground, and I hope I made it clear that we had just to cross a small bay to the head of a waterfall, and to portage there, getting into our canoes again at the bottom. The crossing was very exciting, for we approached the Fall as if we were just going over it, and at the last moment we turned into an eddy, which swept us into a quiet landing-place.

From the bottom, these great rapids are really beautiful; they appear like one great wall of water, stretching the whole width of the river, and divided into four by islands covered with trees.

After we got into our boats we had a very short way to go before reaching another portage, and here the rapid went round two sides of an island, and we got in at the quiet side (the third), and came round to the front of the Fall, where we could look up at it. The weather continues to be perfectly lovely—a bright sun, not too warm, and everything is so gay and pleasant.

The third portage we made was about three quarters of a mile long, but we could not see the danger we escaped until we were some way from it; then we looked back on a very fine fall. At the fourth portage we crossed an island which divided an immense rapid, and came to a place which looked worse to go down than anything I have hitherto seen; the two rapids met here, and there was such a bubbling and boiling that the uninstructed eye could not see the way out of the difficulty. We appeared to start straight for a great hole, and then to be borne away from it by a back current, and I was very glad when I found myself safe at the bottom, and when we landed at a very pretty camping-ground.

Indians have put up on a post the skull of a bear, to show other Indians that they have killed bears here, and we have taken the teeth as souvenirs of the place.

We came down another long, rough rapid, and then down some pretty little ones, and stopped rather early to camp, because the place was so beautiful we wished to stay at it.

It is at the mouth of the Birch River, which here flows into the Winnipeg; and the two are flowing in opposite directions round an island. There are five or six other islands in sight, but the ground itself is not very good for camping: the rock shelves into the water, and we have to cut places in the wood behind for our tents.

Thursday, 6th.—We have been going down quite a chain of rapids this morning, and have had five portages one after the other. At the bottom of each we looked up at what this country calls "rapids," but what any other would dignify by the name of waterfalls. Some of us came down one that really was a precipice; there was a descent of quite four feet, almost perpendicular, so that our canoe slanted headforemost down, and then rose lightly on the waves.

The whole afternoon we had a fair wind, and sails were improvised in each canoe; with them we went very fast through the water, and landed at five much nearer to Fort Alexander than we had expected to get. On one side of us there is a roaring rapid, and another one lies before us, for to-morrow morning. My tent is in a most picturesque spot: I am in an arbor of trees, and I look across the lovely little bay, and down the river—summer lightning enabling me to see the view every now and then. Nellie's tent is behind mine, and she rejoices in the noise of the Fall, which she thinks a delightful lullaby.

Friday, 7th.—We finished all our camping without having had a drop of rain, but this morning the sky looked gloomy, and we had our waterproofs ready to put on. We got up at six, and had only a cup of chocolate and a biscuit, so that we might get off quicker; for when we have a more elaborate breakfast we have to wait so long while the dishes are being washed.

The consequence of our frugality was that we got over “the long portage” by 8.30; and very long it was, more than three quarters of a mile, hilly and slippery ground, and hard for the men to carry the heavy canoes over. This day we made five portages, and as the rain did come on a little, and as the sky was cloudy, they seemed more tiresome than usual. At one of the portages a canoe fell, and an immense hole was made in it. The men set to work and mended it quickly: they got balsam-root, with which they sewed the birch-bark over and over, and then with rosin they covered the stitches up, and the canoe was ready for the water again.

There was only one shower in the morning, but as we were approaching Fort Alexander in the afternoon it began to rain pretty hard. The sight of their destination set the men a-singing, and we had all sorts of boat-songs, and rowed our four canoes up to the quay to the triumphant tune of “En roulant ma boule.”

Gunshots were fired off from various cottages on the banks as we passed them, and when we landed we found arches prepared for us to pass under.

The hostess at this fort is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Flett, of the Stone Fort; her husband is a Mr. Mackenzie, and she has one dear little boy, and a baby.

We had expected to meet our steamer here, but it has not arrived, so Mrs. Mackenzie is going to let us camp in her house. As it is raining, it is very pleasant to be under a roof, and we enjoyed a cup of tea with "real" milk very much, though certainly we have not been able to complain of our food on this expedition; it has been excellent, and it was for the first time yesterday that we had to do without bread, and take to sailor's biscuit instead.

Saturday, 8th.—A great disappointment awaited us this morning—the unaccountable non-arrival of our steamer. She ought to have been waiting for us days ago, and we are shut up here until she does come. There is neither telegraph nor other communication with the outer world, and we wonder how we shall "kill time."

We went to visit the house of an Indian who farms on a neighboring reserve, and found there the old Chief to whom D. gave a watch at St. Peter's, and a few of his friends. The house is very well built, but it has only one room ; and I hear that, however large their families may be, the Indians have not yet begun to wish for more accommodation.

D. looked about, found fault, praised, and gave good advice and a parcel of tobacco. We wound the Chief's watch for him, showed him how to wear it, and conversed with his brother, who is a pagan, painted, and less civilized, but a very jolly old gentleman. He is trying to build a house, but finds it much " more difficult to make than a wigwam " ; and if the truth were told, he would probably consider it less comfortable when finished. The Chief told His Ex. that he was " very hungry " (they all say this), and D. said, " and I am starving, my steamer has not come in, and I have eaten all my provisions " ; upon which the Chief laughed immensely, and was quite satisfied.

We visited a curious grave—a coffin raised far from the ground on four posts.

Thus did we spend the day, and we were just going to sit down to dinner when in walked Mr. Campbell, carrying a mail-bag ! Of course we thought our steamer had come. But no ; he had started in her, but she ran ashore in a fog, and after vainly trying to pull her off, the Captain sent him on to tell us of his misfortune. It is indeed a great disappointment to every one concerned. The steamer has been done up for us, and in her we hoped to go round Lake Winnipeg, and to get into the Saskatchewan ; now this appears to be impossible, and we shall have to hug the shore in canoes, and shall not be able to do the Lake or the Saskatchewan at all.

Mr. Campbell came in a flat-bottomed boat with two men, and had a very adventurous journey; one day he was blown fifteen miles out of his course, and had great difficulty in landing. He slept under his boat at night, and once a tremendous thunderstorm passed over him. I believe he really was several times in danger of being upset, there was such a strong wind.

There is just a chance that, as the wind blows in the right direction, the Colville may get off her mudbank; but we shall not know that yet. We have had such beautiful weather the last twenty-four hours that we regret the loss of our steamer immensely, and I am sure the Captain will be almost distracted. The reporter who was to have joined us in her would not face the flat-bottomed boat!

Sunday, 9th.—We were all up and ready for breakfast at seven o'clock, and by nine we had said "good-by" to the Mackenzies, and had packed our canoes, and started afresh on our way to Gimla (the Icelandic settlement). We had made up our minds to "rough it" in the way of provisions, and looked forward to a possible diet of pemmican. Ugh! And we were bearing our disappointment in the most Christian manner, and were cheerfully reading our papers, and paddling along in our four canoes, when a cloud of smoke appeared on the horizon, and a cry of "The steamer!" rose simultaneously from all the boats. There she was, off her mudbank, and on her way to meet us. We soon got on board, and we found her most comfortably fitted up. I must confess, when I first saw her at Winnipeg in her working-dress, that, with every desire to make the best of everything, my heart sunk a little at the idea of spending six days in her. Now she looks very nice; she has been repainted, and the hold has been turned into a beautiful dining-room. It has been entirely lined with green baize, while the companion ladder is clothed in red, and she has altogether a most cheerful and comfortable appearance. The gentlemen sleep in this saloon. On deck we have a sitting-room, and out of it are two cabins, with two berths in each. There is another nice large cabin for Colonel and Mrs. Littleton.

When we came on board we found a little Icelandic maid-servant, on her way to Mrs. Mackenzie. She could only say "yes" and "no," and her principal luggage consisted of a flower-pot with a geranium growing in it. She went on to Fort Alexander in our canoes. We took a tender leave of all our men, who were greatly delighted with a little extra pay D. gave them. They were a most good-natured, friendly, shabby lot; and each day their clothes got more and more ragged, but at Fort Alexander one or two new shirts and caps made their appearance.

I think our own clothes are rather in the same disreputable condition; for, what with dragging one's self through the bush, sitting by camp-fires, having holes burned in one's gowns, lying or sitting on one's hat, and never having one's boots cleaned, one is conscious of being rather uncivilized-looking when one re-enters society. I have been happy in the knowledge that after this journey my gown need never appear again, and that a misfortune more or less is a matter of no importance. I bought, too, at a Hudson's Bay store, a man's soft gray felt hat, which turns up or down, and accommodates itself to every ray of sunshine; the rain may pour upon it with impunity, and I can lean back upon it, so that wearing it I suffer no economical pangs. The old gown is gray, and I have one new navy-blue serge in which to encounter natives; and this is all the finery I could pack into the canoe.

Nellie also has a dear old frock and hat, and one good one in a box for grand occasions; but she can not have anything of hers on for two minutes without its meeting with some serious accident; the glory of her smart frock has been sadly marred during the two days upon which she has worn it.

Of course we have fresh provisions on the Colville, so the pemmican diet is postponed for a time. The reporter has met us here again.

Monday, 10th.—The longest day I have spent for some time.

Lake Winnipeg is so large we were out of sight of land, and the Colville is a terrible ship for rolling. In this fine weather she rolled all day, and even when we anchored at night she went on swaying from side to side.

Tuesday, 11th.—We started again early in the morning, and landed at eight o'clock on the shores of the Saskatchewan. There is not very much to see at this particular spot: trees on each side of the river, two large wooden houses at the wharf, and some groups of Indians sitting about. They had put up decorations, and fired off their guns as usual. Mr. McTavish, one of the Hudson's Bay Company, came to meet us, and took us two miles across the portage on a tramway laid down since July, and the first railway in the Northwest. The car was most gorgeously lined with colored blankets, and when we got out of it we jumped into spring-carts, in which we did the unfinished part of the railway. During the drive we saw some views of the river, and went to the Hudson's Bay Company's store. We then inspected a new steel steamer, and lunched; and I put in a rivet in the last bit of the railway, and was presented with the hammer. We met here Mrs. Bompas, wife of the Bishop of Athabasca, and offered her a passage in our steamer, which she was thankful to accept. She has been traveling a month to get here, and her journey from an opposite direction makes us feel as if we had not penetrated so very far into the country after all. We also visited Mrs. Mathisson, a half-breed, who gave us some pretty specimens of her work. And then came the event of the day—our descent of the Grand Rapids of the Saskatchewan in a “York” boat. The “York” is a very large, heavy, wooden boat, which holds about twenty people; and the rapids we went down are four miles long. They are simply extremely rough water, and we found them more sea-sicky and less exciting than the Winnipeg River rapids.

In our absence one of our servants got a good bear-skin from a man who killed the animal last night: he saw another bear there, but we have no time to go after it. We fished, but though we saw a man with a great barrowful of beautiful “white fish” fresh out of the water, caught nothing ourselves. Colonel Littleton got three pike in the morning. D. saw an Indian chief, and gave him a gun.

We started off on our journey home about five o’clock, and looked forward with dread to Lake Winnipeg.

Wednesday, 12th.—We had a very good night, and, still better, a beautiful day, so we enjoyed our voyage. We talked to Mrs. Bompas, and heard her missionary experiences. She lives in a place where she never has milk or butter, bread only three times a week (as flour costs £5 a bag), and fresh meat very rarely—pork and pemmican being her chief food all the year round. No spirit is allowed to be sold in the Northwest, so “the pleasures of the bottle” are also denied the inhabitants of these distant regions.

In the middle of the day we went ashore to see some Indians. The Chief was such a funny old man. He gave wonderful expression to his one remark, repeated in a variety of ways while D. was speaking to him ; all he ever said being "Ah!" "Eh!" "Ah!" "Eh!" but one understood his gratitude, his wonder, his assent, and all his feelings, perfectly well each time he emitted the sound. The receipt of a gun evoked a very well-satisfied "Ah!" but the mention of pork and flour brought forth an enthusiastic "Eh!" and a shout from his people.

Thursday, 13th.—4 A. M.: Rolling, rolling, doors banging, jugs upsetting all the morning ; no more sleep to be had, and the melancholy news that it is quite impossible to land at Gimla to greet us when we feebly struggle down to breakfast.

Gimla is the Icelandic settlement which D. must see, and the alternative before us is either to roll about at anchor until the wind shifts, which it may do in a day or two, or to go all the way to the Stone Fort to coal, and return to-morrow (always provided the wind changes).

D. thought the first alternative was out of the question for me, so we settled to come to the Stone Fort—and here I am.

Once safe in a house, with the memory of the rolling fresh upon me, I could not make up my mind to seven hours more to Gimla and seven back again ; so Nellie, Mrs. Littleton, my maid, and I remain here for the night, while D. and the gentlemen, having arrived here at two, started back again at five.

They will get to the mouth of the river before it is dark, anchor there, and, if they can land, go on to Gimla in the morning.

It has been such a dreadful afternoon—pouring rain, and two fearful thunderstorms. I shall have to give you a second-hand account of Gimla. I am very sorry not to have seen it, but the Colville is such a lively little steamer in rough water that I dreaded fourteen hours more of her !

We have telegraphed for horses, and hope to leave this to-morrow. Meantime, Mr. and Mrs. Flett are making us very comfortable.

D. left with a very bad headache; he was up and down all night, saving all our goods from being flung about the cabin, so I was not surprised that he had one.

We landed Mrs. Bompas at the house of Archdeacon Cowley, where she is going to spend the winter.

Friday, 14th.—Our carriages arrived very early in the morning, and we were able to start before noon in the ambulance, or, as my maid calls it, the “rumble-tumble machine.”

We had, during the next six hours, a real specimen of Red River mud. Imagine driving twenty-five miles over a field of clay soil which has just been harrowed, and you may acquire some notion of the way in which our wheels were clogged with mud, and the horses' tails weighted down with great balls of it. Happily it was fine overhead, and we got “home” at five.

We had six mail-bags to open, and were busy till dinner-time reading our letters. The housemaid cooked for us, and we enjoyed the quiet evening after all our traveling.

Saturday, 15th.—Such a pouring morning! We are so glad to be safe at Silver Heights.

His Ex. got to Gimla yesterday. He spoke to the Icelanders, and said in his speech: “The homesteads I have visited seem well-built and commodious, and are certainly superior to any of the farmhouses I remember in Iceland; while the gardens and little clearings which have begun to surround them show that you have already tapped an inexhaustible store of wealth in the rich alluvial soil on which we stand.” He then welcomed them to his country, saying, “It is a country in which you will find yourselves freemen, serving no overlord, and being no man's men but your own; each master of his own farm, like the Udalmen and Bonders of old days"; and concluded with these words: "I trust you will continue to cherish for all time the heart-stirring literature of your nation, and that from generation to generation your little ones will continue to learn in your ancient Sagas that industry, energy, fortitude, perseverance, and stubborn endurance which have ever been the characteristics of the noble Icelandic race."

The gentlemen arrived this afternoon, but the servants did not get through the mud till late in the evening.

Sunday, 16th.—So cold! We are thankful for a fire, and shiver at the thought of our camp to-morrow.

Church in the morning, and in the afternoon a visit from eight men, three ladies, and two children—all Americans from St. Paul, who have come here for a trip, remaining only two days, and coming in for bad weather.

They brought me all sorts of messages from the ladies of St. Paul, who regretted so much they had not seen me there. They did not know I should be at the Reception, and when they heard I was, they "felt so badly," because they had not come to it.

Monday, 17th.—We did not manage to get off ourselves, and our baggage, till after two o'clock; but then we started in the ambulance, and with all the usual riding-horses and wagons, the only difference in our procession being that, instead of the portly form of Mr. McKay, we had a clerk of his in our guiding-buggy.

We reached the camping-ground at five, having driven to it across the prairie; but our provisions and our mattresses did not arrive, and at first we thought we had absolutely nothing to eat. On closer investigation, we found that the cook had a few scraps with him, and of them he made us a capital dinner.

Instead of a belt-tent we tried a leather "lodge"—in other words, a regular Indian tent—the chief merit of which is, that in it you are able to have a good fire. We watched the men putting it up. There are thirteen long, stout poles. Three are tied together at the top, and are lifted up, and spread out at the bottom; eight others are then fitted round these, so as to complete the circle at the bottom, and to form a frame for the leather covering. Two corners of a large sheet of leather are attached to two more poles, and with these it is lifted over the skeleton frame-work; these two poles also work the chimney apparatus.

The tent is quite open at the top, but the two flaps of leather regulate the draught. We had a good fire to go to bed by, and to dress by in the morning; but we let it go out at night. The provisions arrived late in the evening.

Tuesday, 18th.—We got up early, and were breakfasting when Mr. McKay arrived. We cheered his arrival, but I am sorry to say he brought the Littletons a telegram from Dr. Grant to say their baby is very ill, and that they had better return home.

They went back to Winnipeg at once, and will telegraph for further news; they can not get a boat to leave in till to-morrow, and the child may be better.

We were a long time packing our wagons and catching our horses; but at last we started, and had a cold drive over the prairie. D. had a headache, caused, he thinks, by the extremely bad water we had to drink last night. It required no microscope to show the animals in it. Of course we filtered it, but I don't think it was possible to make it wholesome. When we reached our luncheon-place D. lay down, and with a good fire we got a little warm. The sun is bright, but the wind is bitter.

The afternoon was equally cold, and when we reached our camping-ground I was glad to get the "lodge" up as quickly as possible, that D. might get to bed. He was very feverish, and had a terrible headache.

Wednesday, 19th.—I found the fire in my leather house so hot this morning that I had to let it burn down before I could dress at it. D. was better, and able to start in the ambulance with us. We drove past Shoal Lake, where we saw quantities of geese and of large crow-ducks standing upon pieces of rock in the water; our way lay through prairie, oak-coppice, and marsh, and after a drive of seventeen miles we began to see farm-houses here and there, then a Hudson's Bay station, and finally a little cottage, at which we stopped, and from which we looked out on Lake Manitoba.

The cottage is Mr. McKay's. It consists of two rooms, in one of which our dinner will be cooked, and in the other eaten. We pitched all our tents close to the house.

While waiting for the wagons to arrive, we walked down to the Lake, an enormous sheet of water, like a sea, with no land to be seen across it. It is fifty miles wide at this port. The shore is a beautiful sandy beach, and Nellie amused herself with the shells. D. after a little lunch felt well enough to go out for an hour to look after some ducks. Captain Smith brought home a bittern, a plover, and three ducks, but no one else got anything.

Thursday, 20th.—The gentlemen went off in four canoes this morning, and Nellie and I remained alone. We visited the Hudson's Bay store, where Mr. Clark was very civil to us; showed us his bears, his dogs, his garden, and afterwards sent me a quantity of flowers from it. The sun shone brightly, and it was very pleasant.

The sportsmen got home about seven o'clock. His Ex. 18 head, Fred 16, Captain Smith 17, and Mr. McKay 25.

They had several sorts of duck, plover, bittern, grebe, and coot. They saw over a thousand duck, but they were difficult to approach. D. says the shooting was very pretty and curious. They paddled to a sort of marsh, where there were gigantic rushes forming streets, lanes, and squares of water. About these waterways they went, trying to get quietly up to the duck ; but the birds were very wild.

After dinner Mr. Clark and an Indian agent came over from the Hudson's Bay store, and sat by our fire. Mr. Clark has lived here nine years. He has not one single neighbor or companion, and is unmarried.

Mr. McKay described to us how he shot sixteen swans here last April. He had an enormous tub made for himself, which he sunk into the ice ; he had it filled with hay, and surrounded with rushes. As he weighs twenty-eight stone, he must have looked funny in his tub. In front of him he placed a stuffed swan, and there he sat, and shot the live ones which came to look at it. He remained there all day, got frightfully chilled, and was ill for fifty days with rheumatic fever—the first ailment he ever had.

The wind began to rise in the evening, and at night the noise in our tent was dreadful ; the wind whistled in at the hole in the top, and the chimney flapped about. Then an enormous dog crept in, and alarmed me. I heard a rustling, and, looking up, saw a black creature, which I took for a man ; I spoke, and the creature rushed out of the tent in such a rapid manner that I knew it must be a dog. I told D., who declared I was dreaming; but in a short time again I saw this great animal, and again frightened him with my voice (Indian dogs are very shy, but savage if you don't succeed in frightening them); then I got up and barricaded the door of my tent.

Next morning a howling was heard; so D. at last believed I was awake, and got up too, and assisted in making the flapping oilcloth door a little more serviceable. We had everything we possessed piled upon the end of it to keep it down. The noise in the tent was louder than that in a gale of wind at sea, and there was so much draught we had to wrap up our heads as if we were out of doors.

Friday, 21st.—Mr. McKay has a terrible headache, and there is too much wind for the canoes, so the shooting is put a stop to, which is annoying. Fred and Captain Smith have walked out to see if they can get anything in the marsh close by.

The wind fell, Mr. McKay lost his headache, and the gentlemen went off for the afternoon's "hunting," as shooting is called here. They did not bring back a great deal—the birds were so wild; twenty-six the total bag. A number of the birds they shot were lost in the rushes.

Saturday, 22d.—We left our encampment this morning, and after luncheon Mr. McKay, D., and Captain Smith went out shooting again. Fred and Captain Smith tossed up, and Fred lost the place in the canoe. We drove on to the camping-place, which is rather an uninteresting spot. There is not even a shrub near it, and we are in long grass, on a small piece of highish ground surrounded by swamp. We can hear the sportsmen's shots, and see an immense number of ducks escaping, and flying over us. Fred has gone on foot to see what he can get.

LA ROCHE PERCÉE.

They came back, having greatly enjoyed their sport. D. got nineteen birds, and Fred shot seven duck, four of which he brought home.

Sunday, 23d.—We had intended to make a very short journey to-day, but the shooting yesterday kept us back a little. We lunched close to the house of a German surveyor, who brought us some excellent bread-and-butter, and we visited his wife and daughters. He has established himself upon 1,000 acres of good land. We camped about four o'clock, and soon had the pleasure of seeing Colonel Littleton riding towards us. Mrs. Littleton has gone home, but the child is better. Our letters also arrived, and were very welcome.

Monday, 24th.—Started about half-past eight, and drove along a good road and through five farms to Portage La Prairie. There were arches and an address, bands of painted Indians, and a long procession of "buggies." We drove to one farm to inspect it, and as we did not see much chance of any lunch, we asked the old lady for some, and soon filled her house, ate up her bread, tasted her home-made cheese, and drank her rich milk. Her husband and son seemed to take great interest and pride in their farm, and if they had a market they would be very well off; the market and the railway will come in time. They have magnificent crops.

Food and presents were given to the Indians, and we drove back to our camp, which is on the way to Winnipeg, and on the way home!

Indians came and inspected us, and one very tall man, looking grand in his blanket and red leggings, embroidered with beads, sold us first his garters, and then the stripes off his trousers; while an old friend of his, with a green wreath on his head, and wrapped in a toga (blanket, Nero fashion), nudged him, and egged him on to add dollars to his original prices. The man had a beautiful pipe, which he would not sell.

Tuesday, 25th.—Before starting this morning we received an address, and were introduced to a quantity of people at High Bluffs; but we were on our way again by half-past nine. We drove till lunch-time along a good road, and through a beautiful farming-country. By the way, a farmer told me yesterday that they built no barns here, because it would be impossible to have them large enough to hold their grain! There is a great deal of natural wood, the country is flat, and the soil very rich; the only "ifs" the agriculturists have here are, "if" the "hoppers" don't return, and "if" the railway does come,—then they will be millionaires.

We camped at Houses to-night, and I think the only interesting feature of the place was the water. Just as Nelly was about to drink off a tumblerful, she saw that it was full of large and lively animals. Colonel Littleton, who had not looked into his before he drank it, felt very uncomfortable. I think that, throughout our whole journey, water has been our greatest difficulty; though we have always had "water, water everywhere," there was generally "not a drop to drink," unless your filter was at hand. The settlers seem to get accustomed to it; but it would have made us very ill, I am sure.

Wednesday, 26th.—At twelve o'clock to-day we reached Silver Heights, and our journey is virtually over. We have all enjoyed it very much, and are well and much sunburnt after six weeks of almost constant open air. Our good luck in weather has been extraordinary; there was only one single night that we were driven from our camp-fire by rain. The bad weather always seemed to come the days that we had a roof to shelter us; and this morning's drive was cold enough to make us glad that our camping out is over. Our leather lodge was very comfortable, though a little smoky; but a stove in the hall and an open fire in the drawing-room of Silver Heights are not unwelcome luxuries.

The evening was frightfully wet—such pouring rain, as if to make us thoroughly appreciate our house.

Mr. Mills and Mr. Pelletier (two of the Ministers who have been traveling here) came to see us, and were unable to look upon my extreme sunburntedness without remarking upon it.

Thursday, 27th.—Most of us went into town to pay bills and arrange various matters connected with our departure. I called upon the Morrises.

There are such swarms of beautiful birds about the fields and roads. In the distance they all look the same, like small crows; but near, there is great variety. There are orange breasts, and crimson breasts, red-brown heads, two or three colored feathers in a wing, and all the rest of every bird black. They must do a great deal of harm to the grain, one would think.

Friday, 28th.—D. and the other gentlemen went out shooting, and had a very successful afternoon. The bag was seventeen plover, four prairie-chickens, one snipe, one duck, one goose (shot by Fred), one muskrat, and one skunk! There is variety for you!

Mr. McKay and Mr. Donald Smith dined with us. The former gave Nellie and me two buffalo-robies, and he has presented D. with the most magnificent horns I ever saw.

Saturday, 29th.—Last day at Winnipeg. We said good-by to Silver Heights soon after breakfast, and drove through Fort Garry and across the Red River to a place where D. and I each drove in a spike in the Canada Pacific Railway, the first line in this part of the world. The chief engineer had gone to try and get the locomotive there in time for us to start it, but unfortunately it could not be managed. Mr. Whitehead (the engineer) was a stoker on the first line of railway opened in England, and now he is about to open the first line in the Northwest.

When this ceremony was over we visited the Roman Catholic Schools on this side of the water, and there were addresses both from the boys and girls. We crossed the river again, and drove to the City Hall, where a déjeuner was given to the Governor-General.

His speech at it was very good, and the company present were very much pleased with it. He spoke for about three quarters of an hour, and people seemed to listen with all their ears, and laughed a great deal at the amusing parts. He tried to give some idea of the great size of the Dominion, and, speaking of this Province, said :

"From its geographical position, and its peculiar characteristics, Manitoba may be regarded as the key-stone of that mighty arch of sister provinces which spans the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It was here that Canada, emerging from her woods and forests, first gazed upon the rolling prairies and unexplored Northwest, and learned, as by an unexpected revelation, that her historical territories of the Canadas, her eastern seaboards of New Brunswick, Labrador, and Nova Scotia, her Laurentian lakes and valleys, corn lands and pastures, though themselves more extensive than half a dozen European kingdoms, were but the vestibules and ante-chambers to that till then undreamed-of dominion, whose illimitable dimensions alike confound the arithmetic of the surveyor and the verification of the explorer. It was hence that, counting her past achievements as but the preface and prelude to her future exertions and expanding destinies, she took a fresh departure, received the afflatus of a more imperial inspiration, and felt herself no longer a mere settler along the banks of a single river, but the owner of half a continent; and in the amplitude of her possession, in the wealth of her resources, in the sinews of her material might, the peer of any power on the earth."

D. had two addresses after lunch, and about four o'clock we got to the hotel, and received people till five, saying "good-by" to all who came. Then we went over to the Morrises', and had a cup of tea; after which we got on board the Minnesota, and started on our return journey amidst much firing and shouting and waving of adieus.

One dear old member of Parliament (who came as Falstaff to our fancy ball) was quite overcome by the grief of parting with us, and almost fell into the water because he would continue his parting speeches until the gangway was partially removed.

We were very sorry to say farewell to Mr. McKay, whose substantial figure, in his well-known buggy, was one of the last things we saw as we steamed away.

We felt very tired in the evening, for this had been a hard day.

Sunday, 30th.—The Minnesota's screw shakes so much that I find great difficulty in writing at all; but as we travel straight through to Ottawa, I think it better to defy it, rather than wait till I arrive there.

There is a cinnamon bear on board; a tame pig, which answers to the name of Dick, and a dog. The bear sometimes hugs the pig, and the dog rushes to the rescue. Some one tied a bun to the pig's tail to-day, which the bear perceived, and seized; but while he was leisurely arranging himself to enjoy it, the pig seized it, and ate it up.

Monday, October 1st.—Steaming up the monotonous Red River, we reached Grand Forks at two o'clock, and arrived at Fisher's Landing in the night.

Tuesday, 2d.—We went ashore, and saw the engine No. 2 of the Canada Pacific Railway; it is going to Winnipeg with a train of railway-trucks, and it is to be called the "Lady Dufferin."

We started at three o'clock, and slept in the train.

Wednesday, 3d.—We reached St. Paul, and had time to go and dine at the hotel, which made a very nice break in the journey. The Milwaukee Railway Company gave us an additional car here, and sent us off on their line, free of expense, to Chicago. We came this way in order to see the banks of the Mississippi, but unfortunately we had left the river when we got up in the morning.

Thursday, 4th.—We arrived at Chicago in the afternoon, went to see an exhibition going on there, dined at the Palmer House, and left at nine in the evening.

Friday, 5th.—We crossed the St. Clair at Detroit, and arrived that evening at Toronto; the Macdonalds and a number of other people met us there, and sat with us while we had our tea.

Saturday, 6th.—During the night we reached Kingston, and slept quietly in our car till the morning, when, directly after breakfast, we were met by Colonel and Mrs. Hewitt, Sir E. Selby Smyth, and a guard of honor, and went off at once to inspect the new Military College.

It is beautifully situated, and is a very flourishing young institution, and D. saw all the drill, etc. He then visited the Fort, but I went straight to the Hewitts' house, as the wind was bitter, and I had caught a little cold on my journey.

The Hewitts gave us a lunch, and sent us off at two o'clock on our way to Ottawa, where we found the children well and in great spirits.

CHAPTER XX.

OUR LAST SEASON AT OTTAWA AND MONTREAL.

Ottawa : Sunday, November 4th.—There was a bad shock of earthquake in the night. I am sorry to say it did not awaken me; but several people in the house got up to see what was the matter, and there are accounts of it in all the newspapers.

Monday, December 24th.—We went into town, and did a quantity of Christmas shopping, and on our return found that Fred Ward, John Petty Ward, and Price Blackwood had arrived. I was also very busy most of the day getting the Christmas-tree ready; it is always a long business. I have it in the middle of the ball-room, with a little red-baize platform round it, and then a green carpet, forming a square, on the floor round that; on the platform and carpet all the heavy things are put, and the display this year is gorgeous.

Christmas Day, 1877.—We had such a “Merry” Christmas. I must tell you about it.

In the morning we finished the tree, and then we went to church. The children were very anxious to kill time, so after lunch we skated on the river till past four o’clock. Then we had tea, and at half-past five I gave the order to light up. Mr. Dixon, the governesses, all the Littletons, and our guests were present. The display of presents was grand. Victoria was hoarse with screaming over hers, and every one was pleased. Archie (who is at home from Eton for the holidays) was delighted, and in a great state of excitement all day. We were twenty-one at dinner, and had some delightful music in the evening.

New Year's Day, 1878.—At five I began to dress my chicks for their play; but before that I went down to the servants' hall, where all the children of the place were having their tea; the servants had decorated it beautifully.

Then I proceeded to the putting of finishing touches to the actors. The piece, "Fifine, the Fisher Maid," went off admirably, and every one was delighted. The General and his son, Mr. Dixon and Mr. Higginson dined with us afterwards.

Wednesday, January 2d.—Skating on our Rink for the first time this winter.

Thursday, 3d.—We went into Ottawa, and skated on the Rink there. Some gentlemen had gallantly provided a band, and we danced the lancers and other figures, and enjoyed it much. We are still driving on wheels; but the Ottawa is at last frozen over.

This is the day of the children's party. I had tea for grown-up people in the recess off the corridor, and for the children in the dining-room. The guests were all quite delighted with the play, and as it lasted from five till seven, were hungry enough to enjoy their tea. Afterwards they had a great romp in the ball-room.

Monday, 7th.—In the morning we went and skated in town, and although it was extremely cold, we danced our lancers and other figures, and enjoyed ourselves very much. At lunch the gentlemen were full of tobogganing, although the slide was not quite ready. There was a good deal of fun and chaff about it, and they soon went out, and at once decided to go down four on one toboggan. There was so much loose snow that the person steering the toboggan was blinded, and they came against a tree, and J. P. Ward was seriously hurt. Fred rushed up to the house for brandy and assistance, and in a short time they carried him up. The doctor got here in half an hour, and found his leg broken and his side much bruised. He suffered greatly. It is so unfortunate; he was enjoying everything so much, and now his whole winter is spoilt.

Of the other three, Price was stunned and bruised, Fred knocked and bruised, and Fred Ward the least hurt.

Monday, 28th.—Archie and Terence left us on their way to school in England. Mr. Higginson went with them to New York. We all miss them so much, and spent a miserable day. In the evening we got letters from them written in the train.

Thursday, 31st.—Katie and I went into town and had a delightful skate. Mr. Haycock had had a pole put up in the Rink, from which depended a number of ribbons. The dancers stood round it, and each one held a ribbon in her hand; then we went round and round to music, as in the last figure of the lancers, the ribbons being lifted over and under, so that gradually they got plaited round the pole. Then we stopped, turned round, and going in the opposite direction unplaited them again.

A great number of skaters had collected, and we had a very amusing morning-party.

Friday, February 8th.—The day of the opening of Parliament. It was very fine weather, but we had to go in carriages, not in sleighs. The Senate Chamber was full, and looked very handsome: the ladies well got-up, the judges very splendid, etc. Having dressed in our finery so early, we were somewhat tired on our return, but after tea we had to dress again for dinner and the Drawing-room. A thousand people passed—a steady stream for an hour and a quarter—so many courtesies were exhausting.

Monday, 11th.—We left Ottawa, a great party, to stay at Montreal as guests of the City. The only two left behind were Cis,* who is ill, and Mr. J. P. Ward, who was to get up for the first time to-day. Mr. Bierstadt and Mr. Hayes go with us. The latter is the son of the President of the United States.

We reached Montreal at six, and met with a splendid reception. The place was crowded, and there was much cheering, a lovely bouquet for me, an address to D., and a drive through the crowd with four horses to the Windsor Hotel, the bells of the town ringing out a welcome.

We are by way of opening this new hotel—the Windsor. It is a very fine one, and the Reception Committee were awaiting us in the gorgeous drawing-rooms; in reply to their words of introduction, D. told them that the humble rooms at Government House would not be able to contain him on his return.

Our dinner was very good, but a long time being allowed for digestion between each course, we retired before the pudding, and found Gwen waiting to take the gentlemen on to a ball.

Tuesday, 12th.—D., I, and a certain proportion of our party, lunched with Mr. McKay, a dear old gentleman who has spent his hard-earned wealth in building a great deaf-and-dumb institution, which he to-day presents to the City through the Governor-General.

After lunch we drove to the Institution, our sleigh being escorted by a troop of cavalry. The building was ornamented with flags, and was full of people. There were prayers first, then addresses, and an inspection of the rooms.

* My sister-in-law (Mrs. Rowan Hamilton).

Afterwards we went to the Villa Maria Convent, where a very striking scene was presented to us. Turning in from the cold and the daylight (it was a snow-stormy day), we found ourselves in a brilliantly-lighted room, full of young ladies, saw a gorgeous display of flowers, and heard sounds of music—"God save the Queen" played upon harps and pianos, and sung by numerous voices. All the girls wore black dresses for the Pope's death (Pius IX), but they had white lace bibs and cuffs, broad sashes of colored ribbon over the shoulder, and in their hands long sprays of artificial flowers. The hall is a very large one, and all along the walls were rows of girls; at the end of the room a rising bank of the pupils, and in the center three platforms: on one the pianos, on the second five harps, and on the third, D. and I.

We had a good deal of music and six addresses—two in French and two in English, and two from little girls, who presented bouquets.

When we got home we had to dress for dinner and a ball. The latter was given for us in a very fine dining-room in this hotel. There were 2,000 people at it, and it was in every way a success. We entered the room in a procession, and D. danced everything, while I "did" a few squares, and was introduced to numbers of ladies. Everything went merrily till 4.30 A. M., when we retired to bed. Katie* enjoyed this, her first ball, very much, and danced everything.

Wednesday, 13th.—We went to M'Gill College, and at the gates the students met us and dragged us up to the door. Happily, no one was hurt, though these volunteer horses were constantly falling, being dragged by the rope, and half driven over.

* My sister (Lady Nicolson).

I was taken up to the Hall, where I waited the arrival of the new LL. D., for D. was down in the library being clothed in cap and gown. The students soon filled the hall completely, so that it was impossible for His Ex. to get through it, and he had to be brought by a back stair, and appeared through a trap-door on the platform, where the learned sat.

The address and reply were in Greek, and I was listening in a vacant manner, when I saw the Greek scholars smiling at me, and I found that the word Countess had been introduced into the harangue. I came in for a share of glory also when the students presented me with a very handsome silver bouquet-holder, made on purpose for me, with Canadian and English symbols, the arms of the College, and an inscription engraved upon it. After a speech from the president, the new graduate signed the register, was handed his diploma, and was called upon for an address.

I suppose a learned and serious speech was expected; but D. surprised his audience by a few light and airy sentences, and I don't think I ever heard him speak more effectively. He had not thought of anything particular to say, and did not wish to enter into a serious speech about nothing; and, as it turned out, his impromptu jokes were much better. I had one or two people to tea on my return, and after dinner we went to the theatre.

The house was crammed, and presented a most brilliant spectacle. The piece was, in its way, unique, for it was made the excuse for a grand military display. There were at least one hundred and sixty artillerymen and officers, and a number of soldiers in red, exhibited on the stage as about to embark for India. The steamer with its funnel was in the background, the bands played, the regiments marched on board; five horses at a time came on, one ridden, the others dragging the gun-carriage. All was done in regular military fashion, and it made a splendid scene. This was got up for us by the Volunteers, and it was most successful. We did not leave the theatre till midnight, and then were dragged by the snow-shoers of Montreal to the hotel. Our two-legged steeds wore a very picturesque costume, and were very lively horses and most cheery companions. "To bed, to bed, said Sleepy Head."

Thursday, 14th.—We had to leave early to drive a long way out to the Sacred Heart Convent. It is one of the most exclusive of the nunneries. When we got there we were received by the ladies, many of them very charming women. The Lady Superior is an Italian, and very clever and pleasant. They gave us a cup of hot coffee, and then took us into the room where the children were assembled. It is a long, narrow room, the walls covered with white and gold. At the far end of the room was a stage with rustic arbors on it and quantities of flowers, and on it was performed an original musical operetta, in which all the flowers took part, and which ended in the "Rose" carrying a magnificent basket of flowers to his Ex., each of her attendants holding a ribbon attached to it.

When this was all over we were shown the house, and the fine chapel where the girls, with white veils thrown over their heads, marched two and two up the aisle, stopping for a second at the altar, and then on to their places, where they knelt, filling all the center part of the church, the colors of the painted windows lighting up their white figures, and coloring them with a rainbow light, which looked very beautiful. The organ played, and there was some very good singing, the last thing being a sort of grace, for after leaving the chapel we went straight to lunch. There was a large party, and the nuns did the honors. They helped to wait upon us, and at the same time talked to us so pleasantly.

Driving home, we went up the mountain—that is to say, through Mount Royal Park. It is only just made. The road winds up to a great height, and the views from it are lovely. It will be a very beautiful drive to have so near a city.

This evening there was the banquet, and I am sure no Governor of any kind ever received a more magnificent ovation than this at the end of his term of office. The dinner was in the great ball-room. There was one long table down the side of the room, and ten others across, holding in all three hundred and fifty people. The first thing of which I can tell you from personal experience was my own entrance. I went in with my sisters and a few other ladies to hear the speeches. When I came in, every one stood up, most of them on their chairs, and cheered me for so long that, after acknowledging their greeting repeatedly, I sat down before silence was restored. Sir Francis Hincks was the chairman, and of course the Queen's health came first, and was enthusiastically received. As a special compliment, D. next proposed the health of the President of the United States (Mr. Hayes), his son being present.

The toast of the evening was the signal for most tremendous cheering—the gentlemen stood on their chairs, and waved handkerchiefs; and when D. spoke, almost every sentence was followed by the greatest applause, and all the amusing part by roars of laughter. Nothing could have gone off better or more brilliantly than this banquet did, and I wish I had time to give you a better account of it.

Friday, 15th.—We had to be at the Curling Rink at 10.30 to play a great match—the Viceregal Club against the Three Rivers—for the Caledonian medal. The game was an exceedingly close one, but alas! we lost by one point. The Rink was beautifully decorated, even the ice being covered with designs; and our side played very well, though it was beaten.

I skated for an hour, and hurried home to lunch, and to dress for a reception we had at three. That over, I had the Chief Justice to tea, and then got ready for a dinner. In the evening we opened an exhibition of pictures of the Art Association of Montreal, and D. announced that Mr. Bierstadt was going to present the Society with a picture. The hall of the hotel, in which the exhibition was held, is an immense place with a marble floor, and looked very splendid, filled as it was with gayly-dressed company. Some of the principal people came to our room afterwards.

Saturday, 16th.—Our week of ovation is over, and this morning we started for home. Gwen and her dear little baby came to breakfast, and at ten we were off, first of all to visit an india-rubber manufactory and a cotton manufactory, and then to the station, where there was an address.

On the way to Ottawa, by a new line of railway, D. had at least one address at every station, sometimes three—and I generally got a lovely bouquet. We were very kindly, and indeed affectionately, received everywhere, and the whole country seemed to turn out to greet us. A number of gentlemen came part of the way home with us. Lady Sykes and her brother are staying here.

I thought it best to finish the happy part of my Journal first; but there has been a drawback to my pleasure in the week. While D. was dining on Friday, and just before I went in to hear the speeches, I received a telegram to say that Basil had scarlet fever. He is going on extremely well, but of course I shall be very anxious until I know whether this horrid disease spreads. The other children are separated, but they were with him when he first fell ill. His room is in the center of the house, and the isolation is not as perfect as I could wish. Here we are, with Cis in bed, Mr. Ward laid up with a broken leg, scarlet fever in the house, and visitors on the top of all this who "are not in the least afraid." Katie remained at Montreal with Gwen.

But for these domestic misfortunes our week at Montreal would have been an unqualified pleasure. We found everywhere so much personal affection and kindness, and were in every way so magnificently received, that nothing could have been more delightful than it was.

Monday, March 4th.—Mr. Harvey * dined with us, and we had music in the evening. Russell and he played the violin, and Mr. J. P. Ward sang the "Lost Chord" to us. He has a most beautiful tenor voice. He has only just recovered from the tobogganing accident.

Sunday, 10th.—Mr. Ward fell ill to-day, but we were not at all alarmed about him till the evening, when the doctor told us his illness was most serious, and that there was no hope. He was told so, too, and immediately settled all his affairs and wrote a letter. I went to see him in the evening. He was perfectly calm and happy.

Tuesday, 12th.—Mr. Ward passed away this afternoon, having lingered all Monday, exhibiting always the most wonderful patience, resignation, and thoughtfulness for others. I was with him when he died; Fred Ward seldom left him. The anxiety was terrible, for on Monday afternoon we were given a ray of hope, soon to be destroyed again.

* Of Ickwellbury.

Thursday, 14th.—He was buried early in the morning; none went to the funeral but those who knew him, and had been with him here. He was a very great favorite with us all, and this has been a great sorrow to us.

Tuesday, April 2d.—We put off our farewell gayeties as long as we could, but to-day we resume our social duties. I spent the day nursing my voice, driving out, and looking over my parts; at six we dined, and our plays began at a quarter to eight.

“Sweethearts” came first, then “New Men and Old Acres”; and at the end an epilogue—a farewell D. had written for me to speak. No one knew anything about it, not even my fellow-actors, so that it was a great surprise. The worst of it was, that it made the audience so melancholy that the evening ended tearfully.

Thursday, 4th.—Gwen, Russell, the Baby, and Miss Abbott arrived. Muriel is very pretty, and a dear little thing in every way.

Friday, 5th.—Our last play here. We had an enormous audience, and both “Sweethearts” and “New Men” and the epilogue were greatly appreciated. They certainly went off well, and every one was delighted; but all were sad to think that we were having our last party here, and I know I feel miserable about it.

Monday, 8th.—Fred Ward left for England—a signal of our approaching departure, for we shall have left this when he returns to Canada. I hate these symptoms of our waning existence here, I have enjoyed it all so much. His departure makes also the first break in what has been a very happy family party.

Saturday, 13th.—In the morning we drove into Ottawa to see an enormous map of Canada, prepared for the Paris Exhibition. We also looked at models of the Welland Canal.

Hearing that the House had been sitting all night, and was likely to sit all day, we determined to come in again in the afternoon to hear what was going on.

The Opposition were talking against time, to prevent a division being taken about some Quebec affairs (the Governor having dismissed his Ministers) until Monday, as the political meetings among the French are generally after Mass on Sunday, and they did not wish to have the defeat of their motion announced to the congregations.

Last night there were singing and cock-crowing and all sorts of noises, and when Mr. Plumb was speaking another member got up and said he was interrupting the music. When we went—Gwen and I, Mrs. Littleton, and the Colonel—a Member was speaking, merely to fill up the time. He read out of a book, and gave us the title in full several times, and said it belonged to “his hon. friend the Member for Niagara”; and then, when noise was made, he said he feared hon. members had not heard, and so he would repeat what he had been saying or reading. Singing began—“Auld Lang Syne,” “En roulant ma boule”—cock-crowing, and all sorts of noises and fun, while the entertainment—as far as I heard it—ended with the Marsellaise, beautifully sung by a musical M. P. When I got up to go, what do you think happened?—the whole House, both sides, stood up and sang “God save the Queen,” and then cheered. Of course I got out as quickly as I could. We were told afterwards that we had been as “sugar” to the House; that they were just getting very cross when we came in, and that our presence put them in a good humor—very good humor, as you may perceive. They were expecting to sit all night, but at six Mr. Mackenzie consented to adjourn, on condition that the division should be taken early on Monday.

We had a Parliamentary dinner that night, so when I was in the House I instituted inquiries as to who would be able to come. On my return a telegram followed me, "Thirty will not be able to dine"; so I had the dinner moved into the small dining-room, and cut down from forty to sixteen. Soon after another message came to say the House had adjourned, which was agitating; but only thirteen guests arrived, so our table was all right. We had a pleasant little dinner—Mr. Macpherson, Mr. Campbell, Mr. Bunston, Mr. Odell, and the old Mr. Glasier, who went away from our theatricals "because he did not come all the way down here to see a lot of love-making." Mr. Ryan and the Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms, Major Smith, were also there.

Tuesday, 16th.—D. received the address presented to him by both Houses of Parliament. We—Gwen, Nellie, and I—went to the Senate Chamber, where our seats were just in front of the Throne, Ministers' wives, etc., behind. I found it a very melancholy ceremony, and it gave me a nervous headache.

Monday, 22d.—We began our last fortnight of gayeties. Gwen and Russell* are already here, and Miss Abbott and Miss Scott arrived to take part in two concerts. Miss Abbott has stayed with us before, and is very nice, and a great musician. Miss Scott is very pretty and nice, and sings and plays well. They both live in Montreal.

We also began to say "farewell." D. and I went into town, and in the Supreme Court spent an hour and a half, saying good-by to the members and senators. Mr. Kimber and Mr. Fleming dined with us, and we had music in the evening.

Wednesday, 24th.—We had our last "Good-by" at the Supreme Court; and in the evening we had our last big dinner. The table formed three sides of a square, and we had over seventy people. After the ladies left the room a senator (Mr. Vidal) got up and proposed my health; he sent round to ask D. if he might, and he did not like to refuse. We had singing after dinner, and Fred told us, when he saw the party off, they were delighted with their evening. They said they had left a man in the House to talk against time, and had promised to be back at nine; but they did not leave till 10.30.

Friday, 26th.—In the evening we went to see Charlotte Thompson in “Jane Eyre.” She is not a handsome woman, but so good an actress that she makes you quite forget her face. Her voice is very pretty.

Saturday, 27th.—Our concert took place this afternoon, and was most successful. The music was really lovely, and people seemed delighted. In the evening we went to see Miss Multon (“East Lynne”).

Tuesday, 30th.—I have organized a bazaar in our tennis-court to pay off the debt on our little church, and we began to arrange it. The carpenters put up the shields on the walls of the tennis-court and set the tables. We carried down all the things, and some ladies from New Edinburgh came to help, so that when we locked up for the evening everything was ready, and extremely pretty it all looked.

Wednesday, May 1st.—Will the weather be fine? That is what we are anxious about; it pours all the morning. D. is arranging a Picture-Gallery in the ball-room, to which the public will be admitted upon payment of 25 cents. Every painting, water-color, engraving or photograph which we possess, whether in a book, a portfolio, or a frame, is exhibited here, and in addition we have borrowed two very fine paintings of Mr. Gilmour’s. An orange ticket, 25 cents, admits the juveniles of Ottawa, and many of the old people too, to the mysteries of "Punch and Judy," which Mr. Dixon and Mr. Brodie perform most admirably.

We were putting finishing touches to ourselves and to the tables till the last moment, and happily the rain cleared off, and the afternoon was lovely. In the garden we had the Guards' band, and a large tin full of small parcels tied up with string. Near this stood two lovely ladies (Miss Griffin and Miss Scott), with fishing-rods in their hands; for ten cents you were allowed to try your luck—that is, to take the rod and fish for a parcel, and this became so popular an amusement, both for old and young, that it went on all three afternoons, and made much money.

Miss Mary Macdonald sold flowers, and various young ladies had raffle-papers to fill up. Miss Macdonald and Nellie had the principal stall, and I was kept busy at my table answering questions, seeing to raffles, etc. There was so brilliant an account of the first performance of "Punch and Judy," that I went to see the second; but I had not been long in the room when I heard some one say, "There is a fire!" And we did have a marvelous escape.

A smell of gas, a lighted candle—and flames appeared through the floor! Mothers shrieked; but in a few seconds the hose put out the flames, and no damage occurred, except to the unfortunate author of the disaster, the man with the candle, who burned his hand. In the confusion a lady threw her arms round Fred, and said: "Oh my children! my children! my husband is in the Public Works Department; what shall I do?" etc., etc.

The buying and selling, the music, the raffles, the tea, the fishpond, all go on merrily.

Friday, 3d.—The weather was bad yesterday, and we had to keep indoors, which was a great loss to our pockets.

Both Wednesday and yesterday I enjoyed very much, though I don't think I ever was so busy in my life, for I found it impossible, from morning till night, to take my attention off bazaar business for one moment. The third day was harder work, and not so amusing. We had to raffle all the things, and fewer people came, and it was wet; but at the end we had an auction for about an hour, which amused people much.

The thing was a great success. Everybody enjoyed it, and instead of my modest anticipations of making $600, I think we shall clear more than $2,000. Every one said they had never been to so honest or so pleasant a bazaar, and they proved their sincerity by coming every day while it was open.

I am going to pay off the debt on our church (for which I got up the bazaar), and shall give the surplus, and the things left, to the Protestant Orphan Asylum in Ottawa, which is very badly off.

Thursday, 9th.—Parliament was prorogued to-day.

Friday, 17th.—This morning we had an exhibition of the phonograph. Two men brought this wonderful invention for us to see. It is quite a small thing, a cylinder which you turn with a handle, and which you place on a common table.

We were so amazed when we first heard this bit of iron speak that it was hard to believe there was no trick! But we all tried it. Fred sang "Old Obadiah," D. made it talk Greek, the Colonel sang a French song, and all our vocal efforts were repeated. As long as the same piece of tinfoil is kept on the instrument you can hear all you have said over and over again; and the inventor will soon have completed a flat instrument, in which you will be able to put in old sayings of yours, or of others, and hear them again. You may imagine how susceptible the needle is when I tell you that the first time that D. spoke into the machine he spoke too loud, and tore the tinfoil. The last performance was for D. to say something which should be repeated by the machine to a public exhibition in Ottawa in the evening. When D. had finished, it was repeated to us (by the machine), and was, we hope, again delivered with good effect in the evening.

We are scattering for a few days. Nelly goes to Niagara with the Littletons. To-morrow morning D. goes to Toronto for an exhibition of pictures, and I to spend a week with Gwen at Montreal. Then we all meet at Montreal for a Review on the Queen's Birthday.

The house is full of packing-cases, and everything bare and miserable-looking, and I am very glad of a rest and a holiday.

Montreal: Monday, 20th.—In the afternoon Gwen and I walked to the General Hospital, where the Grey Nuns have old people, orphans, and foundlings. We went over the whole institution, which took us fully two hours, and were very graciously received by the Sisters. They admitted us to the cloistered parts, and we saw their foundress lying in state. Her body is covered with wax, and the sight is not at all ghastly—if you could think it was only a wax figure. The superior gave me a very handsome book, a biography of the foundress.

The Hospital will be enormous when the building is finished; it now holds over 700 inmates.

Thursday, 23d.—D., Fred, Colonel Littleton, and Dr. Grant reached Montreal this evening, and came up to tea at Gwen's house.

Friday, 24th.—The Queen's Birthday; a most successful day. The weather was exactly suited to the occasion: not too hot, not dusty, not wet, but bright and sunshiny. The Review began at 11.30, and Gwen, Russell, and I drove up to the Grand Stand at that time. The roads were full of carriages and people walking, and the effect was quite Derby-like. I never saw such a crowd in Canada. The field, the trees, the side of the mountain, were covered with spectators, well-dressed, smart-looking people, and all in the best of humors.

There were about 3,000 troops, and the Governor-General and his "brilliant Staff" rode down the ranks, stopping opposite to a company of United States Volunteers, who had come to take part in the proceedings, to make a little speech, welcoming them to Canada, etc.

The feu de joie, the march past, and a sham battle followed. Everybody was delighted with everything, and what could you wish for more? The horses ridden by the Staff and those in the carriages behaved admirably, though Gwen and I never could get up a perfect faith in ours, and were much alarmed by the bands, and the squibs, which were to be heard at intervals.

We next hurried through a little lunch, and proceeded to the Lacrosse ground. D. was there presented with an address and a "crosse," and we saw two very pretty games. Then we rushed back to the hotel to drop D. for a great military banquet, which began at 5.30. I dined at Gwen's house, and returned to the hotel to pick up the gentlemen on our way to the theatre. The dinner not being over, we went up and peeped in. It was a very pretty sight, all the guests being in uniform.

Saturday, 25th.—D. and I left Montreal at 9 A. M. and with Colonel Littleton and Dr. Grant returned to Ottawa.

Ottawa: Saturday, June 1st.—I was "at home" to say "Good-by"; and as the day was lovely we sat out on the grass. It was very hard to say "Good-by" to so many kind friends. I have two more of these farewells to go through.

Sunday, 2d.—We went to our little church for the last time, and in the afternoon D. and I drove with Nellie, Freddie, and Victoria to the Cemetery, to see the stone put up to J. P. Ward's memory. It is a small Irish cross. On our return we found Dr. Grant; he can't bear to say "Good-by," and comes here nearly every day.

Thursday, 6th.—We went into town, where an address was presented at the Town Hall. There was a large guard of honor and crowds of people. The building is a new one, with a fine hall, where we were received.

The Mayor read the address, and when that and the answer were over we shook hands with all the people who liked to come up. Then we went out on the balcony, and an alarm of fire was sounded, that we might see the engines at work.

D. then addressed the guard of honor (Governor-General's Foot Guards), and we drove away amidst loud cheers. We were shown a full-length picture of D., an excellent likeness, painted by order of the Government for the Parliament Buildings.

I am sure I have told you before how much Fred is liked here, and what a popular A. D. C. he has been. Well, as a proof of their appreciation of his unfailing kindness and courtesy during the last six years, his Canadian friends have presented him with a handsome silver tray, teapot, urn, cream-jug, etc.—quite an unprecedented honor!

Friday, 7th.—Left Ottawa. We had to get up early and be at the boat by seven. It was trying; first we had to say good-by to all the people about our house, and then at the wharf we found many friends. The large guard of honor was drawn up on the top of the cliff, and at the water's edge were the friends.

A number of young men—the bachelors—were waiting for me on board with a bouquet and silver holder; then the ship began slowly to move away, and there were long cheers and waving of handkerchiefs till we were out of sight. Ottawa looked lovely as we left, and never shall we forget our happy six years here and our innumerable friends.

We had to change at Grenville into a train, and there say a few more good-bys. After half an hour we got into another steamer, which took us to Montreal. At several of the small places we passed, crowds had collected to give us a parting cheer. At Montreal the steamer was full of people, all come to say good-by, and to see an address presented. This was from the Curlers, and with it was given a beautiful colored photograph, with a view of Montreal, and portraits of ourselves and many other people we know. It is an oil picture, and is a most charming remembrance. D. replied; but in the middle of the ceremony the galleries began to creak, and the crowd had to get out of them quickly.

Saturday, 8th.—Up very early to see the children off to England. We breakfasted on board the Quebec steamer, and went in a tender to the Allan s. s. Scandinavian. The Bishop and Mr. Dobell are on board, and it was a lovely day for starting; but it was very sad seeing all our flock go—and now we have half left Canada.

Dufferin and I, Mr. Reynolds and Mrs. Littleton, went on board the Druid, and are now on our way to Gaspé; but we shall not be ourselves till we have slept upon all the partings of the last two days. It has been so delightful in Canada, and never again, I fear, can we hope to be surrounded by so many true and kind friends.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE EASTERN TOWNSHIPS AND LAST DAYS IN CANADA.

Tuesday, June 11th.—Everything we do now seems to be impressed with that horrid word “last”; here we are at Gaspé, for the last time, enjoying our last fishing, cruising for the last time in the old Druid, and mentally saying “good-by” to many a pleasant thing which has become a habit to us during the past six years.

We arrived early in the morning, and even before breakfast there was an evident excitement on deck, and I could hear through my skylight as I dressed “yarns” of the forty-pounder the Colonel had lost, and of the smaller fry he and Sir F. Graham * have killed. I elected to remain at home to-day, but Mrs. Littleton went with Mr. Reynolds to stay a few days with him, and to join her husband on the York.

. Fred and D. went to the lower pools of our river, which they can fish from the Druid.

I am left in possession of “Tinker,” Fred’s devoted fox-terrier. No blandishments of mine affect him; he chooses to sit in sackcloth and ashes until his master’s return; he shivers in the ante-room, will not be warmed by my fire; will not even eat the mutton-chop I present him with, and makes me feel rather small at my signal failure to gain his confidence.

* The late Sir Frederick Graham of Netherby.

Wednesday, 12th.—Rain all night, the river rising. And—as I tell the gentlemen to cheer them—there are fourteen hours to be spent in doing nothing! I divide my day into hours of eating, working, reading, writing, and walking on deck. So I hope to answer all my letters, to braid Victoria an elaborate frock, and to be well read in the history of the War of Independence before I go to Boston.

The afternoon was fine, and D. sketched, and some very important telegrams came. I had a cipher one to do, which took me two hours and a half, and that made a hole in the fourteen! There is a riot at Quebec; the soldiers out, the ringleader shot, and many people wounded.

The Littletons arrived when we were at dinner, and we spent a pleasant evening hearing of their adventures, and playing whist. Sir Frederick remains with Mr. Reynolds.

Thursday, 13th.—The steamer which was to take the Littletons away arrived unexpectedly at 5 A.M., and they had to pack and go off at once.

D. and Fred went out fishing, and brought home only one salmon each; Fred's was a beauty, weighing 29 lbs.

When D. came home he settled for us to go up to the bush, as the fish have left the lower part of the river. This was just arranged, when he got a telegram from Quebec asking him to have a British regiment sent there, so D. thinks he had better return at once. The fires are lighted, coal taken on board, and by two o'clock in the night we are off. Great will be the disappointment to the men we employ here when they come in the morning and find us gone. Before starting we sent off numbers of telegrams, and the clerk of the office said his "head felt very bad." He seldom has so much work to do at quiet Gaspé.

Friday, 14th.—Such lovely weather, the sea like a glass, and covered with fishing boats. We stopped and bought over sixty cod, some of them very large, for two dollars.

Saturday, 15th.—At Father Point we received a telegram from Dent to say that all our rooms were filled with soldiers, beds on the floors, etc. We made up our minds to stay on the Druid.

Sunday, 16th.—We found on our arrival at Quebec this morning that most of the soldiers had left, so we went up there and found everything tidy again. There is still one regiment here, and the officers are filling the rooms we intended for Gwen.

Dent had to provide for sixty officers—give them blankets, towels, etc.; so I don't know what they would have done if she had not been here. She kept them in great order, too, and insisted upon their replacing a pillow which had come to grief in a bolstering match.

We had an escort of cavalry to come up to the Citadel with. Everything seems quiet for the present.

Colonel Strange came to see us, and told us all about the riot. The day was muggy and wet, and in the night there was a severe thunderstorm.

Monday, 17th.—D. was very busy all day, and in the evening we dined at the Lieutenant-Governor's. I sat between him and M. Joly, the Prime Minister; and on the other side of him was a pleasant man. They talked a great deal, and were very amusing. It was a large dinner. We had the military chiefs who distinguished themselves in the riot, Sir Narcisse Belleau, Mr. Irvine, and several more of the political celebrities here.

Wednesday, 19th.—There was a review of the 8th Royals this morning on the Esplanade. It was fine and sunny, and the regiment gave great satisfaction to the military lookers-on. D. complimented them, and on their return to barracks they were disbanded.

Thursday, 20th.—We had a very pleasant expedition to-day. Starting in the Druid about lunch-time, we went over to the Island of Orleans, where we drove in a carriage lent to us by a “Habitan.” The views from the island are lovely.

Friday, 21st.—We slept on board and started early in the morning, reaching St. John, a town at the other end of the island, by breakfast-time. We were not expected there, but the Druid was seen in the distance, and by the time we landed every cottage had hoisted a flag or a tablecloth, and people were at every door bowing and smiling.

After our drive round this end of this pretty island, we found more preparations had been made: two men had got themselves into red tunics, and seven or eight young ladies had guns, and fired an impromptu and amateur feu de joie. They also had bouquets ready for us, tied with white ribbon; mine had written upon it “For Lady Dufferin, in remembrance of her visit to St. John.” The curé said if he had only known before, we should have had all the country-people in to greet us.

Quebec: Saturday, 22d.—At three o’clock we went to the House of Parliament, where addresses were presented to D. on his approaching departure; he replied, and both addresses were read in French and English. The room was very full, every one having come to see the ceremony. The speeches in Parliament upon the address were extremely flattering, and, coming from both sides of the House, are very gratifying.

Sunday, 23d.—We had some difficulty in arranging our journey to Boston—to which city D. has been invited in order to receive a Doctor’s degree from the University of Harvard—so as to arrive there on Monday ; it would take twenty-four hours, and there were no trains on Sunday. We talked of going up to Montreal in the Druid, but as that would have cost the Government £100, we gave up the idea ; and virtue was rewarded, for the mail steamer arriving, an express train had immediately to be sent off. So we finished our packing and went in that. D. and I had an excellent night in the train, and reached Montreal at six in the morning.

Monday, 24th.—We started again at nine on our way to Boston.

The railway passes through a lovely country—rivers and mountains and fertile valleys—and we arrived at Boston late in the evening. We were met at the station by Mr. Winthrop, who had just been assisting at rather a melancholy dinner—a gathering of the survivors of his class at college fifty years ago ; the heavy hand of Time had of course committed fearful ravages in the half-century, and I only wonder anybody was able to dine at all.

He drove us out to Uplands, which is about a quarter of an hour from Boston, in a suburb called Brookline. Our host's family consists of Mrs. Winthrop, his daughter, and an invalid daughter of Mrs. Winthrop's. We had tea, and were then glad to go to bed.

Tuesday, 25th.—Immediately after breakfast there were prayers in the hall, which is long and narrow, going right through the house, with a door at each end into the grounds. The walls are wooden, and covered with pictures ; there are tables, books, busts, and bronzes about, and it makes a very nice sitting-room. On one side is the dining-room, and on the other the drawing-room, and another small room.

At eleven we went for a drive in the neighborhood ; a very pretty neighborhood it is—villa after villa, surrounded by plots of grass and gardens open to the road. Then we lunched, and then came what I call the American part of the day. I had had an idea of sitting out in the garden and of walking in the grounds ; but as I came out of the dining-room I was told that I must rest, and that dinner was at six. I was led therefore up to my room, again reminded of the dinner-hour, and shut up there for the remainder of the day. Having a nice book, I reconciled myself to this un-English way of spending the afternoon.

At dinner I sat between Mr. Winthrop and Mr. Longfellow, with Mr. Dana on the other side of him ; Wendell Homes and Mr. Parkman opposite ; the Governor of the State, the Chief Justice, Mrs. Amory, Mrs. Mason (formerly Sumner's wife), Mrs. Perkins, ourselves, and young Mrs. Winthrop, formed the party.

In the evening there was a reception, and we saw a number of distinguished people.

Wednesday, 26th.—This morning D. drove with an officer in a carriage-and-four to the State House, where he met the Governor, and at ten went with him, escorted by lancers, to the College (Harvard).

We ladies did not leave the house till ten, and then went to Harvard, and took our seats in a handsome theatre, immediately opposite to the platform, where all the University celebrities sat.

There were nine orations ; after which the classes came up one by one, listened to some words in Latin from the President, and were handed a bundle of degrees, which were re-distributed afterwards. When D. received his he was greatly cheered. We were allowed to peep into the fine hall, where the party (800) lunched ; D. was there, and had to make a little speech ; he did not get back till six. We went to Mrs. Eliot's (the wife of the President of Harvard), and had a ladies' lunch.

She is very pretty and nice, and I enjoyed it very much. I drove home with Mrs. Winthrop through a very fine cemetery filled with beautiful plants.

Thursday, 27th.—I spent a very quiet day, taking a drive with Mrs. Winthrop in the afternoon. D. went to another lunch, with an “oration” before it. The speeches were not reported, but I hear his was very amusing and good.

Friday, 28th.—D. and I went to breakfast with Longfellow. He and his daughter, a Mr. Green, and ourselves, were the party. Longfellow was very pleasant and kind, and gave me at leaving a copy of “Keramos,” in which he wrote my name.

He told us of a letter he received from a lady, asking for his autograph, and suggesting that he should copy her one verse of that lovely poem of his beginning “Break, break, break.”

We got back to Uplands at eleven, and soon after started on a very long drive to see Mr. Adams. He was Minister in London at the time of the War, and made many friends there.

He lives in a charming old-fashioned house, which has been added to in every direction; and a few years ago he built a library in the garden, which is a fine room, with something very quaint about it. There are box borders in the garden, and everything is old-fashioned and English-looking.

Mr. Adams has five sons, all doing well; but the New Englanders seem to think that the money of the West will prevent the Eastern men from ever taking a prominent part in politics again. Mrs. Adams is a very nice person, and there was a very pretty daughter-in-law there too. We had luncheon with them. The drive is a beautiful one, and the day was warm and sunny.

Mr. Parkman dined with the Winthrops, and had a long talk with D. Miss Motley is staying here.

Saturday, 29th.—We were up very early, as the train started at eight, and we had a long drive to Boston. The Winthrops and Miss Motley saw us off. They have been most kind, and our visit has been very pleasant.

Indeed I must say that wherever we have been in the States we have been most kindly received. Nothing can exceed the hospitality of Americans; they seem as if they never could do enough for the comfort and entertainment of those who visit them in their own homes; and D. and I have now had many opportunities of appreciating their kindness to strangers.

The day was hot, and it seemed very long in the train—from 8 A. M. till 9 P. M.; then a rush up to the hotel for tea, and then all night in the “cars.”

Sunday, 30th.—We reached Quebec early in the morning, and came over to the Citadel.

Monday, July 1st.—A very hot day, upon which we did not do much till the evening, when we started in the Druid—Fred, D., and I—for Bic, where we take the train for Casaupscal, on the Metapedia River.

Tuesday, 2d.—It was very pleasant sitting on deck till bed-time last night, with the prospect of a beautiful passage, but less delightful when we awoke this morning, and recognized that easy roll produced by a swell, and heard that the wind was very strong, and that we were just going to anchor on account of the fog.

This we did, and when I felt a little more accustomed to the motion, or when it was lessened by anchoring, I got up, and looked into the surrounding mist, wondering when it would clear, and whether we should see land soon enough to get ashore, and catch the train anywhere; and what the Stephens' would think when they went to the station and did not find us, they not knowing that we had trusted to the sea at all; and what Gwen would imagine if she did not hear of us for three days (which is quite possible). But happily our "wonders" were cut short by the lifting of the fog, and we found ourselves between three shoals, and near Rivière du Loup. We landed at once with our baggage, sending our servants on first, had a long drive to the station, and near it met a very excited old Frenchman who told us that the train had just gone when our servant arrived, but that they had stopped it at the next station, and were going to send us on in a car and engine to pick it up. There is some use, you see, in being Governor-General.

When we reached the train at Cacouna, Mr. Brydges, the chief of the line, came into our carriage, and we found that we had been keeping him waiting. As, however, the train was originally an hour late, we only added a little to its delinquencies.

Bic, where we were to have landed, is such a pretty place; and, indeed, on our way to Casaupscal there are several lovely bits of scenery, though a great deal of the country looks desolate and dull.

Mr. Brydges had his wife and family on board his own private car, and he and his friends walked about with hats upon which was written "Great Cæsar's Ghost." We asked the meaning of this, and found that it is the name of a barge on which he lives in his river. He fishes in the Restigouche, a magnificent river which branches off from the Metapediac at a place called the Forks. Up this he is drawn in his barge, anchors it at the top, and makes excursions in boats, always returning to his yacht at night.

We got to our destination about half-past eight, and found Mrs. Stephens, Mr. Douglas, and Sir Frederick Graham at the station to meet us. Mr. Stephens is, unfortunately, away.

This is much more civilized fishing than our river affords. The house itself is a very nice cottage. A railway runs along the banks of the river; the station is close to the house; there is a telegraph, and there is nothing lonely about the life. The surroundings, too, are open: you look over distant hills and mountains, and have plenty of space round you, very different from our "bush."

We had an excellent dinner, and afterwards sat round an iron pot full of fire, the fuel being supplied by Peter, a character of dwarfish height, who used to keep a lighthouse, but left it in disgust because his wife's master invited so many guests to see the lighthouse, and each one put his or her finger on the reflector, leaving a smudge, which Peter had to rub out. I can imagine how aggravating it must have become. Gwen had told me of this man, and warned me that he would always enter my bedroom without knocking; however, I think a lady has been told off to wait on me.

Mrs. Stephens was much afraid we should be too hot in our bedroom, which is under the roof; but the evening cooled down considerably, and we found it luxurious; also there are no flies, which is delightful.

Wednesday, 3d.—We got up at seven, had a cup of tea and a bit of bread, and went out fishing. D. and I went together in a wooden canoe with a man called John Beshavi, a Gaspé fisherman. I worked away (Mr. Stephens being very anxious that I should catch a salmon) and D. flogged the water, and we tried "Alec's Elbow," another pool—but eleven o'clock came and not a rise had we had, so we went home to breakfast, and found that every one else had been equally unlucky. It was too hot, or had been too hot (salmon are wonderful creatures for finding out reasons for not rising); but we were cheerful, and hoped for better sport in the evening.

Breakfast was a great meal of porridge, smoked salmon, bacon, eggs, tea and coffee; and after it came a period of rest and idleness. I sat with Mrs. Stephens till about four, when the gentlemen went out again, and I took a walk with her.

We went along the road to Alec's Elbow, where D. was fishing, and watched him for a long time. Then we walked back to the house, and he returned there too, and made me come and try my luck in a beautiful pool close to it; but no! not a fish to be seen. It was dinner-time, and D. was just taking "one cast more," when the joyful click of the reel was heard, and away rushed a salmon, jumping out of the water, and then taking another long run, so that D.'s line was nearly all out. We followed him as well as the very rough water would permit; but our long-expected victim dropped the fly out of his mouth, and left us feeling very much "sold." The fishing having been so bad all day, the whole household were collected on the bank to watch the capture!

We dined well, in spite of our misfortunes, and spent the evening as usual.

Thursday, 4th.—We have Mr. Brydges's private car on the line, and an engine whenever we want to move about; so we settled to make an expedition to see the river to-day. We started at 7.30, servants and luggage in our car, D. and I in one canoe, Sir Frederick in the other; and we had a charming morning going down the river, fishing at every pool, but seeing no prey.

At eleven we reached Assmaquaghan, where our car was "anchored," and in it we found a breakfast laid, and everything looking so comfortable.

Then we ordered the engine to start, and had a really lovely "drive" to Campbelltown. The junction of the Metapedia and the Restigouche is quite beautiful, and all the way along the road the views are well worth coming to see.

At Campbelltown D. and I walked down to the pier, and, sitting down there, enjoyed the views and the sea air till our engine had turned round, when we got "on board" again, and came back to our anchorage.

When the sun was low, we resolved to give the salmon another chance, but by dinner-time the only thing caught was a small grilse, which D. got just before dinner, and which we ate at once. We have most comfortable bedrooms in the car, where we slept after we had sat over a splendid camp fire outside.

Friday, 5th.—The morning fishing over, we set our engine going, and returned to Casaupscal in time for the eleven o'clock breakfast; and very hungry we were for it. In the afternoon every one set to work again, and D. caught one 28-pound salmon, and Fred one 26. While we were away he got one 25 pounds, so he has been the luckiest of the party.

After dinner no less than seven bonfires were lighted in our honor—six on the opposite bank of the river, and one nearer to us. They looked very bright in the dark night.

Saturday, 6th.—Fishing unlucky—nothing done in the morning; and at three we left in our special train, very sorry not to spend a few days more in this pleasant spot.

In about two hours we got to Rimouski, where there were a crowd and an address. We drove round the village, looked into a college and a convent, and returned to our car, where we refreshed ourselves with a cup of tea. The next station was Bic, and there we had another address, and walked through the village and down to the quay, where we found our own boat waiting for us. Bic is quite lovely: the hills are of most curious and pictur-esque shapes, and I should think it a charming place to spend a summer in. We looked into a great cave, where a party of Indians were burned by their enemies long ago—exchanged greetings with Mrs. Archibald Campbell, whose children were firing a salute in our honor, and who has a very pretty cottage here, and then got on board with the curé, a M. Sylvain, and some other visitors, who went over the Druid, and then left us. We remained at anchor till twelve, and then set off for Tadousac.

Monday, 8th.—We started up the Saguenay. At one we began to fish for trout, and by three had caught about seven dozen between us. In the evening, as we were anchored, we got a boat's crew to row round us, singing the Canadian boat-songs.

Tuesday, 9th.—Sir Frederick Graham and Fred left us at Chicoutimi (where we arrived early in the morning), and went on an expedition after land-locked salmon. They will camp out for three or four days. D., Gwen, and I went by steamer to Ha-Ha Bay, and there, getting into a buggy, drove to the A-Mas River. D. had capital sport here with two good salmon, and we enjoyed watching him, and looking at the salmon jumping up the leap.

We returned to the Druid, dined, and sat on deck. In the night we started again, and arrived at Tadousac in the morning.

Wednesday, 10th.—Went over our empty house, took away our blankets, but left all our nice furniture, and shut it up—the last time, I suppose, we shall ever see the place. I hate these good-bys.

Russell Stephenson came on board, and we started for Quebec. Unfortunately, the day was very wet and disagreeable; but the rain will put out the bush fires, which are very bad just now at Three Rivers. The Montreal boat actually had to turn back on account of the smoke.

Thursday, 11th.—Got to Quebec early, and came up to breakfast at the Citadel. I suppose we shall not again spend a night in the dear old Druid. In the evening we got a telegram from Sir E. Thornton (Washington), to say that two thousand roughs had left Buffalo, and gone to Montreal to “help” on the 12th.

Friday, 12th.—Great anxiety felt in the morning as to what would happen in Montreal. Three thousand troops are there, and the Mayor has two hundred special constables.

At eleven the General telegraphed, “There will be no procession”; and the end of the whole thing was, that the Mayor found an old Act which declared the procession illegal; he seized the marshals as they came out of the Hall, and the rest of the people remained shut up the whole day, and in the evening were conveyed home in cabs. We hope this is the end of it.

Sunday, 14th.—Sir Frederick and Fred returned from a pleasant expedition, but unsuccessful fishing. They came back in a boat full of Americans—forty-seven of the Maine Press Association—and had great fun, as these people sang, and recited, and acted, and made speeches. They were all in church this morning, and we asked them to come up and see the Citadel and have tea. It was rather awful when they first arrived, as there was no one to introduce them, and they came in two and three together, all arm in arm. However, I cut it short by going and shaking hands with every one, though they evidently did not consider this an introduction, as all afternoon they kept re-introducing me one to the other.

They said they were a large party, "all harmonious, all serene, all bent upon having a good time, all acquainted since childhood." We walked about the platform, and they were much pleased when they found they were admitted into the "inner circle," and that it was a private spot. They greatly appreciated our beautiful view, and were interested in all we showed them. Then we gave them tea and claret-cup, which they seemed to enjoy; showed the Plains of Abraham, and then returned to the Citadel to say "Good-by."

Forty-seven people shaking hands quickly, and all saying the same thing in a different form: "Thank you for delightful entertainment"; "Most happy to have seen you"; "Such a lovely time"; "Your hospitality"; "The honor"; "Hope to see you in the States"; "Will never forget"; "Never expected"; "The feature of our tour," etc. I smiled almost too pleasantly over this ceremony.

In the morning paper I see that "their Excellencies received the parties most graciously, and were quite as free from restraint as themselves." One man told Fred to give his love to his mother, and tell her she had a good son.

There was one very funny little man who combed his hair in the drawing-room when he came in; but I never could talk to him, as some one was always being introduced to me.

Saturday, 20th.—We were up early, and breakfasted at eight. Directly after we went down to see Sir F. Graham off to England. Colonel and Mrs. Littleton came down from Ottawa, and their children sail to-day. I was very sorry to say good-by to them, as it is another break-up of our life here.

At twelve we had a combination of breakfast and luncheon, no one having eaten much this morning; and afterwards we went over to the Camp, where we saw a little bit of a fox-hunt, and the gentlemen played lawn-tennis.

The Littletons and Mr. Adams (son of the American Minister in London during the War), with a friend and a young Mr. Potter (son of an English M. P.), dined with us. Mrs. Littleton and I were left till 11.30 up-stairs alone, the gentlemen having got into politics down-stairs.

Tuesday, 23d.—Mrs. Littleton, Gwen, Baby, and I drove out to Sillery, where the nuns received us most graciously, and then we went on to the Prices. They have a lovely place on the St. Lawrence, with some fine trees on the lawn and a good view of the river; there are a nice old-fashioned house and flower-garden, and we had tea with strawberries and cream, and flowers to take home. D. rode there, and found a game of tennis going on when he arrived.

Tuesday, 30th.—D. remains another month, at the request of the Secretary of State.

Wednesday, 31st.—We made up our minds to go out for tea, so at four we drove off to Spencer Wood, where we sat on the grass and admired the view, and on leaving were presented by the gardener with three bouquets, one for each lady. The Littletons dined with us.

The papers are full of "Our New Governor-General," and all are delighted at the idea of having a Royal Princess here.

Monday, August 5th.—The Roman Catholic Bishops of the Province of Quebec, who had been assisting at the consecration of the Bishop, called. There were seven or eight of them, gorgeous in purple and gold. The new Bishop of Chicoutimi (Racine) was one of the nicest.

We heard of the death of the Apostolic Delegate, Dr.

Conroy, Bishop of Ardagh. He died in Newfoundland. I am very sorry, as he was always longing to get home, and never seemed to be happy over here. His old parents are alive, and will feel his death terribly.

Tuesday, 6th.—Sir Edward Thornton came to stay with us, and it rained—poured in tropical style. However, when in the afternoon it changed to drizzle, we went out and showed the town to Sir Edward. At six we went on board the Druid, and dined there, as we were engaged to attend an amateur theatrical performance on the Island of Orleans. The expedition would have been charming had the weather been fine, but of course the rain spoiled our pleasure in all the yachting part of it. We landed at eight o'clock, and drove up to what had been a carpenter's shop, but was now converted into a "Theatre Royal"; the "green-room" was a tent, and the porch, in which the band stood, was made of tarpaulin.

I rushed through this as one does when one is bundled up in waterproofs and is making for a shelter, and suddenly found myself, as I thought, upon the stage, in the presence of an audience. I quickly stepped back, and handed out my wraps, allowed the Governor-General to precede me, and made a proper and formal entrance.

Then I found that it was the theatre I had entered, but that in front of the stage there were banks of flowers, two little arbors in the corners, and seven figures dressed in powder and Dolly Varden costumes. You can't think how pretty they looked. There were tables spread with refreshments in the arbors, and behind stood these Dresden figures ready to serve us; and on stools in front were four children—two little girls in each corner—also in costume.

When we had stood for "God save the Queen," and had seated ourselves in the armchairs prepared, a little powdered, china-looking girl came and handed me a beautiful bouquet, and then another came with a painted programme, and between the scenes the grown-up China brought us ices, cake, and claret-cup. The room itself was hung with flags, or rather lined with flags. The play was "She Stoops to Conquer," and it went off very well. The Tony Lumpkin was admirable, and the prima donna was very handsome, and acted very well. She is a Mrs. Watson, and she had arranged the whole thing. The small figures got very sleepy and tired before the end; but they added greatly to the general effect, and amused us a good deal by the natural way in which they admired their own finery, and examined even the soles of their feet and their colored heels.

We went to the hotel afterwards, where we were given supper; so that by the time we got to the Citadel it was nearly two.

Wednesday, 7th.—Actually fine weather! so at eleven we went on board the Druid, a party of fourteen, and sailed for the Montmorency Falls. They were full of water, and were looking lovely. We landed in boats, and our party divided when we got ashore. Some went one side of the Fall, some the other, and some sat down and sketched. I went to the left, and had a very fine view; but we got so wet with the spray that we soon had to move. The workmen there (lumbermen) would keep building me up substantial thrones in the very wettest places, and I felt obliged to try each one for a few minutes; then we went off to see the saw-mills, and were weighed there. About three o'clock, having thoroughly enjoyed the sight of the beautiful Fall, we went on board again. A different but very acceptable sight was the deck, where luncheon was spread; we were all so hungry. Our party consisted of ourselves and A. D. C.'s, the Littletons, Stephensons, Herveys, Judge and Miss Johnston, Colonel Montizambert, the Spanish Consul, and Sir E. Thornton.

Thursday, 8th.—Mrs. Littleton was offered the use of a steam-launch, so she came up early, and invited us all to go on an expedition with her, arranging that I should bring the tea, and that we should go and see the Chaudière Falls. So after lunch we assembled at the dock —Sir E. Smyth and his son, the Littletons, ourselves, and M. Chauveau; also the police-officer (it was the police-boat), who, it turned out, was really the host.

We puffed along quickly, and just had one little fright, when the funnel tumbled down, and of course I thought the boiler was going to burst; however, it was soon put up again, and we reached our destination in safety.

We had to get out and cross the river (Chaudière) in a scow; but we found everybody ignorant as to how far off the waterfall was; some one told us it was two miles, and we trudged off to walk there. People here are not fond of walking, so at the same time messengers were sent to look for buggies; and very lucky this was, for when we had gone two miles in the rain, we asked at a cottage how far it was to the waterfall, and we were told "three miles more."

Four carriages soon overtook us, and D. drove me in a buggy, followed by all the others in various machines. We had one collision: going down a hill, the carriage behind us came too fast, and the horse's leg got over our wheel; both animals being extremely quiet, no harm was done. The storm cleared away, and when we reached the Chaudière the view was lovely. It is a most beautiful fall, and the shapes of the surrounding rocks, which jut out into the foam, are most picturesque. We had a great climb to reach the best point of view, but when we got there we sat directly opposite the Fall, on a promontory of rock, and were able to admire thoroughly the volumes of water and of spray, and the rainbows which shone through them. D. made a sketch, and we sat idle and enjoyed ourselves till M. Chauveau called us to have the champagne with which he had replaced my tea.

We drove back to the scow, and crossed over to the launch, which took us to Quebec in thirty-five minutes. It was 8.30 when we got there, and by the evening we were all extremely tired.

Monday, 12th.—We started at one o'clock upon our tour in the Eastern Townships.

After crossing the river in the steam-launch (steered by His Ex.), we landed at Port Levi, and were presented with bouquets on the way to our car. It is a Grand Trunk private car, and is very comfortable. Our first stop was at Danville, where we were received by a guard of honor and a crowd, and were led to a carriage. We got out at the Town Hall, had an address and a bouquet, and were introduced to a few people; among them an old lady, who said my father's name had been a household word in her family.

We had a drive through the town, which was prettily decorated, and saw thousands of people who had come in from the country.

On our way back to the station D. spoke to an old Peninsular War soldier, who exhorted him to "go and conquer Egypt," which, he said, "we must have."

Having spent an hour at Danville, we got into our car again, and proceeded to Richmond. A platform had been erected here, and an address was presented, signed by eleven Mayors. After being introduced to some people, we had lunch in the station, and then drove about.

D. had four horses, but I drove with Lord Aylmer (who is settled out here) with a pair.

We visited a college, and saw the town. There was a very good band at the station, with a little boy of eight years old, in uniform, playing the cymbals with a most grave and preoccupied air.

Sherbrooke was the station we reached next, and a most magnificent reception it gave us. It was dark when we arrived, and from the railway we saw large manufactories and hotels with lighted candles in every pane.

When we stopped the Reception Committee came on board, and presented Mrs. Littleton and me with bouquets; then we stepped on to a platform, and saw before us a fine guard of honor, a great crowd, a brilliantly lighted building, and a quantity of torch-bearers in red uniform (the Fire Brigade). After the address and reply we started in a carriage-and-four, escorted by three or four hundred torches and a crowd (to say nothing of soldiers), to drive through the town. It was beautifully illuminated and decorated, and the reception was exceedingly gratifying to an almost defunct Governor-General! I must trust to a newspaper to describe the arches, the lights, the various devices for decorating houses, the procession shooting up rockets in every direction, for I have not time to enter into particulars. But I must mention one arch dedicated to me, and made by ladies; it had an enormous coronet of flowers, surmounting it, with "Welcome to our Countess" on one side, and "Kind hearts better than coronets" on the other. One arch was an imitation of a Gothic archway, and was very pretty.

We drove, with the crowd and the torches surrounding us, to Mr. Brooks's gate, where they left us.

We are staying with Mr. and Mrs. Brooks. He is an

M. P., and she is a very handsome and pleasant woman ; they have a very nice house and pretty grounds. The house is new, and had not yet been papered ; but Mrs. Brooks has ornamented her walls in a very effective way by pinning dried ferns and leaves upon them. One large room with a polished floor had our monograms, portraits, quantities of flowers, and a welcome in rhyme on its walls. There is a beautiful view from the windows here. We had had supper, and went to bed soon after.

Tuesday, 13th.—The sun shone brilliantly at breakfast-time ; rain poured from ten till four, all the time we were out ; and then it was beautifully fine the rest of the evening.

We drove into Sherbrooke early, and visited first a fine new bank, just built ; we admired especially the burglar-proof safe, with a lock which, when set to a particular hour, can be opened by neither friend nor foe until that hour arrives. Next we visited the Fire Station, saw the stable-doors opened by machinery, and the horses step out, and fall into their own places in the various fire engines. After this we went to a convent, where there were a little singing and an address ; and to a great wool manufactory, where we saw everything, from wool in its filthiest state to the same article converted into fine cloth. D. was presented with the material for a pair of trousers, and Mrs. Littleton and I were each given beautiful rugs.

After seeing everything, D. made a speech to the operatives, and we proceeded to Lennoxville. In the village there were an address, a platform, and the usual etceteras, and at the College and School the same. It is one of the best English schools in Canada, but the boys were away for the holidays. Two rivers pass by it, and the country round is real country, and very pretty. We had about four miles to drive back to the house of

Mr. Heniker, in Sherbrooke. It is situated on the banks of the Magog, and although only a villa it has a magnificent rapid and splendid rocks, and scenery which many a great English landholder would give his fortune to possess in his park. Mr. and Mrs. Heniker gave us lunch, and showed us the place. By this time I felt very damp. My petticoat was wet and muddy, and my very summery gown was out of place; but it was nothing to our A. D. C.'s unlined suit of tussore silk. The trousers began to look very limp and sticky, and I laughed every time I looked at him.

On our return to the Brookses we had to change quickly for a reception, which was held in the room with the motto.

Happily it had become fine; a band played outside the windows, and a great number of people came. We sat about between the veranda and the rooms till we were all very cold, and then we had a little dance, three young ladies coming in. The daughter of the house, a nice, pretty girl, is not out yet.

D. and the Colonel have to spend the night in the train. They meet Mr. Mackenzie* at Richmond, do business between the hours of twelve and two, and return here for breakfast in the morning.

Wednesday, 14th.—Bed-time. I seize a few minutes to try and describe the doings of a very pleasant day. The weather was perfect, and we began the morning by being photographed in groups at the door of Mr. Brooks's house; then I planted a tree.

We were to have left by train at ten o'clock, but the telegraph had broken down, and the necessary assurance that "the line is clear" could not be obtained. At last they managed in some roundabout way to get the message, and we got off in time to fulfill our engagement to Mr. Murray.

We went for about half an hour in the train to his house on Massiwippi Lake. He has only just built it, but already it is surrounded by lawns and flower-gardens, and has from its windows a beautiful view of the Lake.

Mr. Murray introduced us to his wife and children, and we rowed about the Lake, and then returned as we came to Sherbrooke, enjoying immensely the view of the Lake and of the well-wooded country.

We had about twenty minutes to rest at Mr. Brooks's house before we set off again to drive to Compton. D. and I and Fred Ward were in a very nice buggy, the others following in two more vehicles. We drove fifteen miles through such a lovely country. The townships really are beautiful: so rich looking, so undulating, and so well-wooded.

At the village of Compton there were both English and French addresses, and D. replied to both. Mr. Cochrane met us with a drag and four horses. He lives two miles from the village, and has a wonderful farm. He is one of those people who get a thousand pounds for a calf, a hundred pounds for a pig, etc.

The house and farm-buildings look so comfortable, and there is a nice conservatory, flower-garden, and tennis-ground in front of the house. We arrived about seven o'clock, and after being introduced to Mrs. Cochrane, went up to dress. There were eighteen people at dinner, and we sat out on the veranda afterwards, the grounds being illuminated with Chinese lanterns.

We have very comfortable rooms, and Mr. Cochrane has taken in our whole party. Mr. and Mrs. Brooks dined here, and we said good-by to them afterwards.

They were extremely kind to us, and have entertained us most hospitably.

Thursday, 15th.—We have been out all the morning examining prize cattle. First we inspected calves and bulls and pigs, and then we left the farm-yard and drove about the fields, looking at cows and Shetland ponies. There is a cow here called Tenth Duchess of Airdrie, which has made great sums of money. The views over the country are quite magnificent. I am glad we did not leave Canada without seeing this district.

After lunch we drove fifteen miles in a drag to a village called Coaticook, where a great crowd had collected to meet us. It is a very prettily situated village, and was very flourishing before the hard times. After the addresses on an evergreen-ornamented platform, we walked to the Mayor's house, where we had a cup of tea before driving home. In the evening the neighbors drove over to be introduced, and we sat out on the veranda, and walked in the garden, which was lighted up.

Friday, 16th.—Directly after breakfast, having said “Good-by” to Mrs. Cochrane, her children, and her married daughter (Mrs. Baines), we took our places behind the gallant four, and drove on and on through beautiful country, stopping once at Hatley—a nice little village, where we were received with the usual honors—to Stanstead.

We sat under the shade of some trees just before we got there, and had a little lunch, and once we went a little out of our way to see a specially fine view. Mountains, wood, water, cultivation—everything that is wanted to make up a beautiful bit of scenery—yet none of the millionaires of this country ever seem to think of settling here. Mr. Colby, the member for Stanstead, met us, and drove before us into the town. At its entrance we found a large corps of firemen, some in blue, some in red, awaiting us, and the foremost presented D. with a harp made of water-lilies from the ladies of the place. Then the firemen and their band marched before us, and we kept slowly behind them, my team behaving admirably, considering all things.

Suddenly we came upon a very fine villa, from which hung red and blue and white decorations; but we could scarcely look at them, for marching down the lawn with a sprightly step came four or five ladies dressed in the extreme of the fashion—splendid in silks of blue and olive-green, red and pink, etc., and waving in each hand a pocket-handkerchief; they were Americans, and came into the landscape of a quiet Canadian village most unexpectedly.

Stanstead is just on the border, and these Americans live half the year in Canada and half in the States. We lunched with Mr. and Mrs. C. Pierce, and the beautiful ladies came over to his house here, and the Governor of Vermont (Mr. Fairbanks) met us. Mrs. Fairbanks had sent me a bouquet. They were five widows, all sisters or daughters of his.

We hurried over lunch, as we had to go to a school, where there were two addresses. D. having replied, and having had a little joke, which was highly appreciated, over the American Protection laws, made the people cheer the President of the United States and the Governor of Vermont.

We shook hands with a number of people afterwards, and then got into three buggies and drove twelve miles more to Georgeville, up and down mountains, to Lake Memphremagog, where Sir Hugh Allan's steamer met us; and in her we spent an hour and a half going to Magog, where I now am, and where we arrived about ten o'clock. We were drawn a mile up to the hotel by boys and soldiers, replied to two addresses, admired the illumination of every window, and were too much tired to eat the good food provided for us.

We said "Good-by" to Mr. Cochrane at Stanstead. Our visit to him was extremely pleasant.

Magog: Saturday, 17th.—Our hotel is an ordinary country inn, and the view from the windows is not remarkably pretty, which is the fault of those who chose the sight, as they might have had very fine views. Sir Hugh Allan came for us at ten, and we steamed up the lake in his yacht, seeing all the beauties of Memphremagog.

The two ends of the lake are uninteresting, but there is a fine mountain in the center, called the Owl's Head, and some of the scenery about there is beautiful. Sir Hugh's own place is perfect; it is almost on an island. The house is placed on the top of a high hill, and the smooth grass slope up to it is planted with single trees. The forests of wood on either side, the boat-house and bathing-house, the tennis-lawn, the billiard-room, the bowling-alley, the large veranda, all combine to make it look beautiful and pleasant; while the views from it are splendid.

When we got into the steamer again, we had a thunderstorm, but reached Magog safely at 7.30.

Sunday, 18th.—Very showery and thundery, and a wretched day to spend in a country inn. We went to church, and were preached to by an American bishop.

He, the Bishop of New Hampshire, came to see us at lunch-time, and in the afternoon Mr. and Mrs. Brooks appeared.

They brought us the photographs taken of the group at their door, and of the arches at Sherbrooke—all very successful; he also gave me some beautiful specimens of minerals for my Canadian collection. After dinner we spoke to some of the people staying in the hotel who had helped to decorate it for us.

Monday, 19th.—We left Magog by train for Bolton, where Mr. Huntington has a country place. The view from his house is quite lovely—a panorama of mountain scenery. It perhaps lacks a little water, for, although he has five lakes within three miles, one does not catch a glimpse of them from the windows.

An address was presented by the neighbors, while a very smartly dressed band played to us.

In the drawing-room was a very handsome decoration—the arms of England made in flowers. Mrs. Huntington is very nice, and she had four American young ladies staying with her. We had a very pleasant lunch, and soon after continued our journey to Waterloo.

It is wonderful what these small towns do to welcome us. We come to a place of 4,000 inhabitants, and find regiments turned out, bands, arch after arch, platforms erected, flags, and all the country collected to meet us. Waterloo really gave a very fine reception. The platform was well-made and convenient, and not only D. and I, but the whole Staff, were presented with bouquets by little girls dressed in white. Then there were speeches, and such cheers! The village has an English inhabitant, who prides himself upon his “Hurrah,” and who led the applause.

We drove round the town in a procession, and I am sure D. ought to have blushed as he read the mottoes on the arches! Here are some of them: “Votre séjour en Canada fournira une belle page dans notre histoire.” “Bienvenue la compagne de celui qui a conquis notre affection.” “To Canada's favorite Ruler.” “Farewell to him who has won the hearts of all Canadians.” “Favorite of the people.” “Canada's Pride.” “Il est la gloire du Canada.” “Prudence, Energy, Charity.”

"Eternal sunshine settle on his head." "He is a right good Fellah." Some of these come from other places.

We dined and slept in our palatial car, and after sunset went out to see the illuminations. D. drove round the town, but I sat on the platform and watched an enormous bonfire burning in the middle of the Square.

Tuesday, 20th, we started for Granby. This is another very small place, where a wonderfully pretty reception was prepared. There is a fine Town-Hall, which was decorated with flowers. In front of the stage was a large harp of flowers, which we afterwards put up on the end of our train as we traveled about. D. made rather a long speech here in English, and a short one in French, and then we drove round the village and admired its decorations. The arches were of very pretty shapes.

At West Farnham we merely got out at the station—address, flags, cheers—and proceeded to Swestsbrough, where we drove through another village called Cowansville. A heavy shower of rain was the only incident which made our visit there different from those at other places.

D. generally has two replies to make, and always one. He speaks ex tempore, and people like that.

St. John was our next point, and it was the end of our official tour. It gave us a splendid reception; its one handsome street was beautifully decorated, and every window was full of people, in addition to the crowd in the street. The address itself was a remarkably pretty one. When D. had answered it both in French and English (it was read in both languages), we drove to visit a handsome Roman Catholic church, and an interesting china manufactory, where we were given specimens of the work. The girls read me an address and gave me a bouquet. We also saw the English Church and the old barracks, and then got into our train, and started on a little holiday trip.

We stopped at Plattsburg, which is in the States, and slept on board the Vermont, a magnificent steamer, on Lake Champlain.

Wednesday, 21st.—We awoke “at sea” on Lake Champlain, and after breakfast sat on deck and enjoyed the scenery. Ticonderoga is reached at one, and we immediately got into a train, which in twenty minutes disgorged its passengers on Lake George.

This is a smaller and a very lovely lake too; but I prefer Lake Champlain, as the mountains are more distant than they are at Lake George, where the hills rise straight from the water. All along the Lake are little hotels, where we stopped and exchanged travelers. At the end of the Lake we came to our destination, Fort Henry. As soon as the steamer touched there was a rush: the men on board tore away, and raced towards the house. They had gone to secure the outside places on a number of coaches which stood there, and were all going on to Glen Falls and Saratoga.

We took a quiet drive in a carriage, conducted by a coachman who has held his office for four years, but who is now only twelve years old, and very small. We dined at the hotel. Such dresses! and such hats to be seen! But we were most amused—in a melancholy way—by the children. They were dressed out with the shortest of petticoats, the most magnificent silk and muslin and lace dresses, the best of colored silk stockings, and boots with large bows to match; such curls, and fans, and bracelets! and, above all, such airs, and such consciousness of deserving admiration! The way they came into the large dining-room by themselves, and often sat alone at a table, the girls looking twenty and the boys rather naughty and undisciplined. This young generation living its hotel-life, with no duties, and no object but dressing itself and being admired, is a startling phenomenon.

We came in for a very good concert which Marie Roze, of the Italian Opera, happened to be giving to-night.

Thursday, 22d.—Left the hotel early, and came down Lake George again, and on to Ticonderoga, where we visited the old Fort before going on board the Vermont again.

We had another pleasant journey down Lake Champlain, and got on to our car, in which we proceeded on our way to Montreal. There I found my English letters, for which I have been pining all the week. So ended our last Canadian "official" tour.

Saturday, 24th.—I received letters which oblige me to return home at once. It is a great disappointment to me to have to leave D. and Gwen, and it made us all very miserable.

Friday, 30th.—We went down to the Druid to say good-by to the men, and to present the Captain with a telescope.

The improvements which D. suggested should be made at Quebec, with a view to preserving its old walls and gates, its picturesque appearance, and its ancient character, have been begun, and the "Dufferin Terrace" promises to become one of the loveliest walks in the world.

Saturday, 31st.—A final good-by to Quebec, and to my happy Canadian life; and good-by also, for a time, to D. and Gwen. The B Battery turned out to accompany me, and to fire a salute for me, and after the ship left the wharf they all cheered from the Citadel. Numbers of people came down to the steamer, though it was early in the morning that I left.

In one of his farewell speeches in Canada D. said : "During a period of six years I have mingled with your society, taken part in your sports and pastimes, interested myself in your affairs and business, become one of you in thought and feeling, and never have I received at your hands, whether in my public or in my private capacity, anything but the kindest consideration, the most indulgent sympathy, and the warmest welcome." This being so truly the case, no wonder that although the day itself was lovely, it was one of the most miserable I ever spent.

After I left, D. received a deputation, consisting of the chief officers of all the municipalities of Ontario, who came to Quebec to present him with a joint address. The ceremony took place on the platform at the Citadel, and the deputations arrived, preceded by three Highland pipers dressed in the tartans of their respective clans. In his reply to them he spoke much of the Princess Louise and Lord Lorne, and said that, with regard to the latter, he only knew of one fault—"of one congenital defect which attached to his appointment as Governor-General of Canada—he was not an Irishman." Several other addresses were presented to D., and he was made a Doctor of the Laval University.

Later he went to Toronto to open a provincial exhibition, and whilst there he visited institutions and made a number of speeches. It was at this time that he suggested in a letter to the Governor of New York State that the Governments of Canada and of the United States should join together to create an International Park at Niagara; that the troublesome touts and squatters, with their hideous shanties and wooden huts, should be got rid of; and that "the locality should be restored to its pristine condition of wild and secluded beauty." This project has since been carried out, and the islands in the Niagara River have been called after him.

Before D. finally left Canada there was a change of Ministry, and Mr. Mackenzie, who had been in power for over four years, having resigned, the departing Governor-General swore in Sir John Macdonald on October 17th, at Montreal.

The last public act D. performed in Canada was to lay the foundation-stone of the Dufferin Terrace, and on October 19th he sailed from Quebec, receiving at the wharf a final address from the citizens and residents of Quebec.

A ROUND AND ABOUT SOUTH AMERICA:
Twenty Months of Quest and Query. By FRANK VINCENT, author of "The Land of the White Elephant," etc. With Maps, Plans, and 54 full-page Illustrations. 8vo, xxiv + 473 pages.
Ornamental cloth, $5.00.

No former traveler has made so comprehensive and thorough a tour of Spanish and Portuguese America as did Mr. Vincent. He visited every capital, chief city, and important seaport, made several expeditions into the interior of Brazil and the Argentine Republic, and ascended the Paraná, Paraguay, Amazon, Orinoco, and Magdalena Rivers; he visited the crater of Pichinchas, 16,000 feet above the sea-level; he explored falls in the center of the continent, which, though meriting the title of "Niagara of South America," are all but unknown to the outside world; he spent months in the picturesque capital of Rio Janeiro; he visited the coffee districts, studied the slaves, descended the gold-mines, viewed the greatest rapids of the globe, entered the isolated Guianas, and so on.

IN AND OUT OF CENTRAL AMERICA; and other Sketches and Studies of Travel. By FRANK VINCENT.
With Maps and Illustrations. 12mo. Cloth, $2.00.

BRAZIL: Its Condition and Prospects. By C. C. ANDREWS, ex-Consul-General to Brazil. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"I hope I may be able to present some facts in respect to the present situation of Brazil which will be both instructive and entertaining to general readers. My means of acquaintance with that empire are principally derived from a residence of three years at Rio de Janeiro, its capital, while employed in the service of the United States Government, during which period I made a few journeys into the interior."—From the Preface.

CHINA: Travels and Investigations in the "Middle Kingdom." A Study of its Civilization and Possibilities. With a Glance at Japan. By JAMES HARRISON WILSON, late Major-General United States Volunteers and Brevet Major-General United States Army. 12mo. Cloth, $1.75.

"The book presents China and Japan in all these aspects; the manners and customs of the people; the institutions, tendencies, and social ideas; the government and leading men."—Boston Traveller.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE COURT OF THE TUILERIES. By MADAME CARETTE, Lady-of-Honor to the Empress Eugénie. Translated from the French by ELIZABETH PHIPPS TRAIN. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00; paper cover, 50 cents.

The inside view which these Recollections give of the Court of Louis Napoleon is fresh and of great interest.

"We advise every one who admires good work to buy and read it."—London Morning Post.

MEMOIRS OF MADAME DE RÉMUSAT. 1802-1808. Edited by her Grandson, PAUL DE RÉMUSAT, Senator. 3 volumes, crown 8vo. Half bound, $2.25.

"Notwithstanding the enormous library of works relating to Napoleon, we know of none which cover precisely the ground of these Memoirs. Madame de Rémusat was not only lady-in-waiting to Josephine during the eventful years 1802-1808, but was her intimate friend and trusted confidante. Thus we get a view of the daily life of Bonaparte and his wife, and the terms on which they lived, not elsewhere to be found."—N. Y. Mail.

"These Memoirs are not only a repository of anecdotes and of portraits sketched from life by a keen-eyed, quick-witted woman; some of the author's reflections on social and political questions are remarkable for weight and penetration."—New York Sun.

A SELECTION FROM THE LETTERS OF MADAME DE RÉMUSAT. 1804-1814. Edited by her Grandson, PAUL DE RÉMUSAT, Senator. 12mo. Cloth, $1.25.

MEMOIRS OF NAPOLEON, his Court and Family. By the Duchess d'ABRANTES. In 2 volumes, 12mo. Cloth, $3.00.

The interest excited in the first Napoleon and his Court by the "Memoirs of Madame de Rémusat" has induced the publishers to issue the famous "Memoirs of the Duchess d'Abrantes," which have hitherto appeared in a costly octavo edition, in a much cheaper form, and in a style to correspond with De Rémusat. This work will be likely now to be read with awakened interest, especially as it presents a much more favorable portrait of the great Corsican than that limned by Madame de Rémusat, and supplies many valuable and interesting details respecting the Court and Family of Napoleon, which are found in no other work.

THE STORY OF MY HOUSE. By GEORGE H. ELLWANGER, author of "The Garden's Story." With an Original Etching by Sidney L. Smith. Also many Head and Tail Pieces. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

Even a more delightful book than "The Garden's Story." Though seemingly devoted to the house proper, the essays are filled with the freshness of country life and the beauty of external nature.

THE GARDEN'S STORY; or, Pleasures and Trials of an Amateur Gardener. By GEORGE H. ELLWANGER. With Head and Tail Pieces by Rhead. 12mo. Cloth, extra, $1.50.

"Mr. Ellwanger's instinct rarely errs in matters of taste. He writes out of the fullness of experimental knowledge, but his knowledge differs from that of many a trained cultivator in that his skill in garden practice is guided by a refined aesthetic sensibility, and his appreciation of what is beautiful in nature is healthy, hearty, and catholic. His record of the garden year, as we have said, begins with the earliest violet, and it follows the season through until the witch-hazel is blossoming on the border of the wintry woods. . . . This little book can not fail to give pleasure to all who take a genuine interest in rural life."—The Tribune, New York.

THE FOLK-LORE OF PLANTS. By T. F. THIS-ELTON DYER, M. A. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"A handsome and deeply interesting volume. . . . In all respects the book is excellent. Its arrangement is simple and intelligible, its style bright and alluring. . . . To all who seek an introduction to one of the most attractive branches of folklore, this delightful volume may be warmly commended."—Notes and Queries.

FLOWERS AND THEIR PEDIGREES. By GRANT ALLEN, author of "Vignettes of Nature," etc. Illustrated. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"No writer treats scientific subjects with so much ease and charm of style as Mr. Grant Allen.

"The study is a delightful one, and the book is fascinating to any one who has either love for flowers or curiosity about them."—Hartford Courant.

FROM FLAG TO FLAG. A Woman's Adventures and Experiences in the South during the War, in Mexico, and in Cuba. By ELIZA MCHATTON-RIPLEY. 12mo. Cloth, $1.00.

The author of this book was the wife of a planter in Louisiana, and underwent some remarkable experiences in the first part of the war; later in Mexico, many vicissitudes befell her; and of her life in Cuba, still later, she has a striking and unusual story to tell.

"In a word, the book is an account of personal adventures which would be called extraordinary did not one remember that the civil war must have brought similar ones to many. Her hardships are endured with the rarest pluck and good humor, and her shifty way of meeting difficulties seems almost to point to a Yankee strain in her blood."—The Nation.

THE HISTORY OF A SLAVE. By H. H. JOHNSTON, author of "The Kilimanjaro Expedition, etc. With 47 full-page Illustrations, engraved fac-simile from the author's Drawings. Large 12mo. Paper cover, 50 cents.

"'The History of a Slave' is a work of fiction based upon every-day occurrences in the Dark Continent, and well calculated to bring home to the reader the social condition of heathen and Mohammedan Africa, and the horrors of a domestic slave-trade."—The Athenaeum.

THE MEMOIRS OF AN ARABIAN PRINCESS. By EMILY RUETE, née Princess of Oman and Zanzibar. Translated from the German. 12mo. Cloth, 75 cents.

The author of this amusing autobiography is half-sister to the late Sultan of Zanzibar, who some years ago married a German merchant and settled at Hamburg.

"A remarkably interesting little volume. . . . As a picture of Oriental court life, and manners and customs in the Orient, by one who is to the manor born, the book is prolific in entertainment and edification."—Boston Gazette.

SKETCHES FROM MY LIFE. By the late Admiral HOBART PASHA. With a Portrait. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"The sailor is nearly always an adventurous and enterprising variety of the human species, and Hobart Pasha was about as fine an example as one could wish to see. . . . The sketches of South American life are full of interest. The sport, the inevitable entanglements of susceptible middies with beautiful Spanish girls and the sometimes disastrous consequences, the duels, attempts at assassination, and other adventures and amusements, are described with much spirit. . . . The sketches abound in interesting details of the American war."—London Athenaeum.

A NEW BOOK BY THE AUTHOR OF "A SOCIAL DEPARTURE."

AN AMERICAN GIRL IN LONDON. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN. With 80 Illustrations by F. H. TOWNSEND. 12mo. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.50.

A brilliant book, picturing English sights, society, customs, and amusements, as seen by an unconventional and witty observer. The same qualities which made "A Social Departure" so remarkable a success will make "An American Girl in London" a book which is "talked about everywhere."

"In the lighter literature of last year there was nothing more amusing than 'A Social Departure,' by Sara Jeannette Duncan, of Canada. It was just long enough—it could not well have been longer—but each reader wished that the author might write another book in similar style. Well, she has done it, and she could not have taken a better subject than 'An American Girl in London.'"—New York Herald.

"The raciness and breeziness which made 'A Social Departure,' by the same author, last season, the best-read and most talked-of book of travel for many a year, permeates the new book, and appears between the lines of every page. It is superfluous to say that 'An American Girl' is 'awfully fetching.'"—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

A SOCIAL DEPARTURE: How Orthodoxy and I Went Round the World by Ourselves. By SARA JEANNETTE DUNCAN. Illustrated by F. H. TOWNSEND. 12mo. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.75.

"It is a cheery, witty, decorous, charming book."—New York Herald.

"Widely read and praised on both sides of the Atlantic and Pacific, the diary is now republished in New York, with scores of illustrations which fit the text exactly and show the mind of artist and writer in unison."—New York Evening Post.

"... It is to be doubted whether another book can be found so thoroughly amusing from beginning to end."—Boston Daily Advertiser.

"A very bright book on a very entertaining subject. We commend it to those readers who abhor the ordinary statistical book of travels."—Boston Evening Transcript.

"A brighter, merrier, more entirely charming book would be, indeed, difficult to find."—St. Louis Republican.

"For sparkling wit, irresistibly contagious fun, keen observation, absolutely poetic appreciation of natural beauty, and vivid descriptiveness, it has no recent rival."—Mrs. P. T. BARNUM's Letter to the New York Tribune.

"Every intelligent reader and student of poetry has of course his own favorites, but we are safe in saying that no popular anthology is so well calculated as this to gratify and instruct the general public, or to provide for the genuine lover of verse so much that is good and worthy of preservation."—Boston Traveller.

"Mr. Dana has added nearly two hundred poems to his well-arranged collection, including many short poems by authors who have not published volumes. The collection now includes eleven hundred and seventy-five selections from three hundred and seventy-seven authors, eighty-five of whom are Americans and fifty-two women. This edition gives a list of authors, a list of the poems, and an index of first lines, and is printed with new type."—New York World.

FIFTY PERFECT POEMS. A Collection of Fifty

Acknowledged Masterpieces, by English and American Poets, selected and edited by CHARLES A. DANA and ROSSITER JOHNSON. Darley, Swain Gifford, Harry Fenn, Appleton Brown, William Sartain, Arthur Quartley, J. D. Woodward, Walter Satterlee, S. G. McCutcheon, and J. E. Kelley. The illustrations are printed on Japanese silk paper, and mounted on the page. The volume is bound in silk; white, blue, or maroon. Large 8vo. $10.00.

"The judgment of the editors has not been constrained by the general popularity of a poem. Happily, their verdict and that of the public often agree."—Cincinnati Commercial Gazette.

"... As to the binding, it is rich watered silk, printed in gold, a delight to the eye. 'Fifty Perfect Poems' is certainly the most notable gift-book of the season."—Philadelphia Press.

"An unusually handsome presentation volume."—Chicago Tribune.

"A feature of the volume which will commend it to book fanciers is its superb workmanship and adornment. It has seventy designs, exquisite gems set in the stream of verse which flows through the broad immaculate pages. They are remarkably impressive in effect, terse and refined in expression, and in their peculiar setting seem like veritable windows opening upon the outer world from the illuminated chambers of the poet's imagination. We have never seen a series of pictures more nicely adjusted in their tone to the music they accompany than are these. Whoever has had the direction of this work, deserves credit for the best piece of artistic book-making ever done in this country."—New York Home Journal.

THE NUGENTS OF CARRICONNA. An Irish Story. By TIGHE HOPKINS. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

A SENSITIVE PLANT. A novel by E. and D. GERARD, joint authors of "Reata," "The Waters of Hercules," etc. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

"An agreeable and amusing love-story, the scene of which is part of the time in a coal-mining district in Scotland, and afterward in Venice, and a prominent character in which is a shrinking girl whose sensitiveness is suggestive of the little mimosa flower which gives title to the book."—Cincinnati Times-Star.

DOÑA LUZ. By Don JUAN VALERA. Translated by Mrs. MARY J. SERRANO. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"A triumph of skillful execution as well as of profound conception of modern Spanish character and social life. It is full of the best traditions of Spanish thought, both sacred and secular, of Spanish proverbial wisdom, and of the humor of Cervantes and other lights of the past in the literature of Spain."—Brooklyn Eagle.

PEPITA XIMENEZ. By Don JUAN VALERA. Translated by Mrs. MARY J. SERRANO. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"The thorough excellence of Col. Johnston's work is well known. He was among the first of the successful short-story writers of this country. The steady increase in his fame is the best indication of the solid appreciation of the reading public. This public will give the new volume the same reception that made 'Widow Guthrie' one of the most successful of recent novels."—Baltimore American.

WE ALL. A story of out-door life and adventure in Arkansas. By OCTAVE THANET. With 12 full-page Illustrations by E. J. AUSTEN and others.

"A story which every boy will read with unalloyed pleasure. . . . The adventures of the two cousins are full of exciting interest, particularly the account of the hog-hunt, which carries one breathlessly along by its moving, spirited, and truthful pictures. The characters, both white and black, are sketched directly from nature, for the author is thoroughly familiar with the customs and habits of the different types of Southerners that she has so effectively reproduced."—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

LITTLE SMOKE. A story of the Sioux Indians. By WILLIAM O. STODDARD. With 12 full-page Illustrations by F. S. DELLENBAUGH, portraits of Sitting Bull, Red Cloud, and other chiefs, and 72 head and tail pieces representing the various implements and surroundings of Indian life.

"There are few writers who know how to meet the tastes and needs of boys better than does William O. Stoddard. This excellent story is interesting, thoroughly wholesome, and teaches boys to be men, not prigs or Indian hunters. If our boys would read more such books, and less of the blood-and-thunder order, it would be rare good fortune."—Detroit Free Press.

KING TOM AND THE RUNAWAYS. By LOUIS PENDLETON. The experiences of two boys in the forests of Georgia. With six Illustrations by E. W. KEMBLE.

JUST PUBLISHED.

MIDSHIPMAN PAULDING. A true story of the War of 1812. By MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL, author of "Little Jarvis." With Six full-page Illustrations by J. O. DAVIDSON and GEORGE WHARTON EDWARDS. 8vo. Bound in blue cloth, with special design in gold and colors. $1.00.

"The book gives an excellent description of the battle of Lake Champlain, told in such interesting style, and so well blended with personal adventure, that every boy will delight to read it, and will unavoidably remember its main features."—Springfield Union.

"The story is told in a breezy, pleasant style that can not fail to capture the fancy of young readers, and imparts much historical knowledge at the same time, while the illustrations will help the understanding of the events described. It is an excellent book for boys, and even the girls will be interested in it."—Brooklyn Standard-Union.

NEW EDITION.

LITTLE JARVIS. The story of the heroic midshipman of the frigate "Constellation." By MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL. With Six full-page Illustrations by J. O. DAVIDSON and GEORGE WHARTON EDWARDS. 8vo. Bound uniformly with "Midshipman Paulding." $1.00.

"Founded on a true incident in our naval history. . . . So well pictured as to bring both smiles and tears upon the faces that are bent over the volume. It is in exactly the spirit for a boy's book."—New York Home Journal.

"Little Jarvis was a manly, jolly little midshipman on board the good ship 'Constellation,' in the year 1800; so full of pranks that he spent most of his time in the cross-trees and lived prepared for this inevitable fate, with a book in one pocket and a piece of hard-tack in the other. . . . His boyish ambition was to smell powder in a real battle, to meet and conquer a live French man-of-war. It would be unfair to the reader to tell how Little Jarvis conducted himself when at length the 'Constellation' grappled with the frigate 'Vengeance' in deadly combat."—Providence Journal.

"The author makes the tale strongly and simply pathetic, and has given the world what will make it better."—Hartford Courant.

"Not since Dr. Edward Everett Hale's classic, 'The Man without a Country,' has there been published a more stirring lesson in patriotism."—Boston Beacon.

"It is what a boy would call 'a real boy's book.'"—Charleston News and Courier.

"This is the story which received the prize of five hundred dollars offered by the Youth's Companion. It was worthy the distinction accorded it."—Philadelphia Telegraph.

"It is well to multiply such books, that we may awaken in the youth that read them the spirit of devotion to duty of which Little Jarvis is a type. We shall some day have need of it all."—Army and Navy Journal.

"Any one in search of a thoroughly good book for boys need look no further, for this ranks among the very best."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

STRAIGHT ON. A story of a boy's school-life in France. By the author of "The Story of Colette." With eighty-six Illustrations by Edouard Zier. 320 pages. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

Few books have appeared in recent years which appeal so strongly to the better sentiments of young people as does "Straight On." It is a deeply interesting novel of the experiences of a French officer's son, who, being left an orphan at an early age, resided with relatives while attending a military school for a term of years. The ups and downs of his life in the new home and at school, adopting his father's last words—which give the book its title—for his watchword, make an absorbing narrative, culminating in an act of heroism which delights the reader while it clears up a mystery in which many cadets have been involved. The story is charmingly told and appropriately illustrated.

ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF "COLETTE."

THES STORY OF COLETTE. A new, large-paper edition. With thirty-six Illustrations. 8vo. Cloth, $1.50.

The great popularity which this book has attained in its smaller form has led the publishers to issue an illustrated edition, with thirty-six original drawings by Jean Claude, both vignette and full-page.

"This is a capital translation of a charming novel. It is bright, witty, fresh, and humorous. 'The Story of Colette' is a fine example of what a French novel can be, and all should be."—Charleston News and Courier.

"To the fretful stay-at-home, to the tired mind, to the wearied attention of busy men when rest comes with the evening, and to the vexed and careful housewife, this bright tale will be received as a gift from the sky, full of pleasant images, quaint figures, and piquant thoughts."—Chicago Tribune.

"Colette is French and the story is French, and both are exceedingly pretty. The story is as pure and refreshing as the innocent yet sighing gayety of Colette's life."—Providence Journal.

"A charming little story, molded on the simplest lines, thoroughly pure, and admirably constructed. It is told with a wonderful lightness and raciness. It is full of little skillful touches such as French literary art at its best knows so well how to produce. It is characterized by a knowledge of human nature and a mastery of style and method which indicate that it is the work rather of a master than of a novice. . . . Whoever the author of 'Colette' may be, there can be no question that it is one of the prettiest, most artistic, and in every way charming stories that French fiction has been honored with for a long time."—New York Tribune.

THE FAITH DOCTOR. By EDWARD EGGLESTON, author of "The Hoosier Schoolmaster," "The Circuit Rider," etc. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"Dr. Eggleston has made a distinct advance in his literary work in 'The Faith Doctor,' the latest novel from his pen. Dr. Eggleston's writing is really American in its character, without making much parade or profession on this point; but he has taken a new phase of American life in this book, and has treated it very ably, besides evincing an increase of literary skill."—Boston Herald.

ONE REASON WHY. By BEATRICE WHITBY, author of "The Awakening of Mary Fenwick," "Part of the Property," etc. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"It is not often that the first novel of an author is such a pronounced success as is 'The Awakening of Mary Fenwick.'"—Christian Union.

"'Part of the Property' is a thoroughly good book. . . . It is refreshing to read a novel in which there is not a trace of slipshod work."—London Spectator.

A MERCIFUL DIVORCE. By F. W. MAUDE. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"There have been few more searching studies of the rampant English plutocracy than is afforded by this brilliantly written volume."—Boston Beacon.

"The book is curiously interesting from the startling side-light it throws on English society of the upper grades."—Chicago Times.

ONE WOMAN'S WAY. By EDMUND PENDLETON, author of "A Conventional Bohemian," "A Virginia Inheritance," etc. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

"The author is a Virginian who has written some interesting stories, and who steadily improves upon himself. . . . This is a thoughtful, semi-philosophical story. There is much discussion in it, but none of it is prosy."—New York Herald.

"In this genuinely interesting novel the author depicts one of the most charming characters to be found in the vast range of woman's realm. . . . The close is artistically devised and shows a deep observation. Mr. Pendleton has a brilliant future before him in his chosen path"—St. Louis Republic.

THE THREE MISS KINGS. By ADA CAMBRIDGE, author of "My Guardian." 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

"May unreservedly be recommended as one of the choice stories of the season, bright, refined, graceful, thoughtful, and interesting from the first to the final page."—Boston Literary World.

D. APPLETON & CO.'S PUBLICATIONS.

THE SOVEREIGNS AND COURTS OF EUROPE. The Home and Court Life and Characteristics of the Reigning Families. By "POLITIKOS." With many Portraits. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50.

"A remarkably able book. . . . A great deal of the inner history of Europe is to be found in the work, and it is illustrated by admirable portraits."—The Athenaeum.

"Its chief merit is that it gives a new view of several sovereigns. . . . The anonymous author seems to have sources of information that are not open to the foreign correspondents who generally try to convey the impression that they are on terms of intimacy with royalty."—San Francisco Chronicle.

"The anonymous author of these sketches of the reigning sovereigns of Europe appears to have gathered a good deal of curious information about their private lives, manners, and customs, and has certainly in several instances had access to unusual sources. The result is a volume which furnishes views of the kings and queens concerned, far fuller and more intimate than can be found elsewhere."—New York Tribune.

"Gives one a discriminating insight into the lives and characters of the reigning kings, queens, and princesses. . . . The reader gets a good idea of them as men and women, apart from their unique and unenviable positions in society."—St. Louis Republic.

"Rarely is so much information to be found condensed in so small a volume."—Baltimore American.

"A most entertaining volume which is evidently the work of a singularly well-informed writer. The vivid descriptions of the home and court life of the various royalties convey exactly the knowledge of character and the means of a personal estimate which will be valued by intelligent readers."—Toronto Mail.

THE KING OF GREECE.

". . . A book that would give the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth (so far as such comprehensive accuracy is possible), about these exalted personages, so often heard about but so seldom seen by ordinary mortals, was a desideratum, and this book seems well fitted to satisfy the demand. The author is a well-known writer on questions indicated by his pseudonym."—Montreal Gazette.

"A series of essays and sketches of the crowned heads which sum up the characteristics of royalty, and give the salient features of the life and nature of individual rulers with an intelligence and considerable weight."—Hartford Courant.

"A very handy book of reference."—Boston Transcript.

"The historical statements are correct, and the royal personages are treated with discrimination. The anecdotes are numerous and well chosen. The author's reading must have been wide, and his comprehension of the present political condition of Europe is excellent."—Literary World.
